PREFACE TO VOLUME I.

THE story of the origin and progress of the NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY has been told at length in various literary journals and magazines, and is familiar to most persons interested in the study of the English language. The scheme originated in a resolution of the Philological Society, passed in 1857, at the suggestion of the late Archbishop Trench, when Dean of Westminster. It was proposed that materials should be collected for a Dictionary which, by the completeness of its vocabulary, and by the application of the historical method to the life and use of words, might be worthy of the English language and of English scholarship. With this view, it was resolved to begin at the beginning, and extract anew typical quotations for the use of words, from all the great English writers of all ages, and from all the writers on special subjects whose works might illustrate the history of words employed in special senses, from all writers whatever before the 16th century, and from as many as possible of the more important writers of later times. Several hundred readers accordingly entered on the task of selecting and transcribing such quotations, and many eminent scholars undertook to arrange the materials thus gathered. Among those who, in various capacities, lent their services to the work, may be mentioned:—Dr. Trench himself; the late Mr. Herbert Coleridge, the first general editor (who died while arranging for the press specimens of his proposed treatment of some early words); Mr. F J Furnivall, M A, his joint-editor and successor; the late Dr. Guest; Mr. Hensleigh Wedgwood, M.A.; the late Professor Malden; the late Professor T. H. Key; the late Lord Lyttelton; the late Mr. Thomas Watts, of the British Museum; Mr Fitzedward Hall, D.C.L., Miss C. M. Yonge; Professor E. Dowden, M.A.; Mr Henry Hucks Gibbs, M.A.; the Rev. Professor W. W. Skeat, M.A, the late Sir John Richardson, K.C.B.; Mr. W. M. Rossetti; the late Miss Harriet Martineau, the late Hon. G. P. Marsh; the late Mr R. Grant White. The time requisite to complete even this preliminary labour of reading books and collecting quotations proved so long, that several promoters of the undertaking died, and many became absorbed in other duties, before it was possible to take in hand the actual preparation of the intended Dictionary, but the materials continued to accumulate, till upwards of two million quotations had been amassed, portions of which were also provisionally arranged, and made more or less ready for use.

Origin work.

For several years no further steps were taken; but, in 1878, specimens which had been prepared from some of these materials by the present Editor, on behalf of the Council of the Philological Society, were submitted to the Delegates of the Clarendon Press. The Delegates consented, upon certain conditions, to bear the expense of printing and publishing a Dictionary to be founded on these materials, the preparation of which in its present form was commenced in 1879. Careful examination of the quotations, then for the first time collected in one place, and arranged in a continuous alphabetical series, showed that much work still remained to be done, in order to render the material adequate for the purpose. Accordingly a new appeal was made to volunteers to collect additional quotations from specified books, of which lists were from time to time issued. More than 800 readers responded to this appeal, the majority them being in Great Britain, but also a large number in the United States (of whose work Prof. F. A. March, of Lafayette College, Pennsylvania, most kindly undertook the organization and superintendence), and not a few in various British Colonies and Foreign Countries In the course of three years a million additional quotations were furnished, raising the total number to about 3½ millions, selected by about 1300 readers, from the works of more than 5000 authors of all periods About thirty sub-editors (including a few who had never ceased to work for the Dictionary) offered their gratuitous services in arranging quotations, preparing definitions, and otherwise contributing to the execution of the work. Without the generous aid of these various contributors and fellow-labourers, so great a task could never have been undertaken. The names of the Sub-Editors are given at the end of this Preface, and their respective contributions towards the preparation of parts of the work will be indicated as these are reached: the Reference-List of Books read, to be given hereafter, will also commemorate the names of the Readers; but a list of those who have most largely contributed to the work is appended to this Preface.

Aim. The aim of this Dictionary is to furnish an adequate account of the meaning, origin, and history of English words now in general use, or known to have been in use at any time during the last seven hundred years. It endeavours (1) to show, with regard to each individual word, when, how, in what shape, and with what signification, it became English; what development of form and meaning it has since received, which of its uses have, in the course of time, become obsolete, and which still survive, what new uses have since arisen, by what processes, and when (2) to illustrate these facts by a series of quotations ranging from the first known occurrence of the word to the latest, or down to the present day, the word being thus made to exhibit its own history and meaning and (3) to treat the etymology of each word strictly on the basis of historical fact, and in accordance with the methods and results of modern philological science.

In order to facilitate reference, great pains have been taken to make the page eloquent to the eye, by the employment of different sizes and styles of type, by the arrangement of the paragraphs, and by the prominence given to the dates of quotations. Since the original scheme of the Philological Society was projected, the great French Dictionary of M. Littré has been given to the world, and has been made use of in determining some of the features of the present work. The size of page adopted is the same as that of Littré, but the breaking up of the articles into paragraphs, the typographical distinction between explanations and quotations, and other differences, will, it is hoped, be recognized as improvements.

Vocabulary. The compass of the Vocabulary, and the general features of the work, are described in the General Explanations which follow. The Vocabulary will be found to be, even in its modern words, much more extensive than that of any existing Dictionary. And it will be observed that this fullness is not due to a large inclusion of words strictly foreign, or of the Latin or Latinized generic names of Natural History, which are here inserted only when found to be used, more or less, as English words. In connexion with this, it has to be borne in mind, that a Dictionary of the English Language is not a Cyclopædia: the Cyclopædia describes things; the Dictionary explains words, and deals with the description of things only so far as is necessary in order to fix the exact significations and uses of words. Their vocabularies are only to a limited extent identical: that of a Cyclopædia consists mostly of nouns,—names of things and processes,—but without restriction as regards the language to which they belong; that of an English Dictionary consists of words belonging to all the parts of speech, but they ought to be English words, or currently used as such. We do not look in a Cyclopædia for the explanation and history of anon, perhaps, or busy; we do not expect, in an English Dictionary, information about Book-binding, Photography, the Aniline Dyes, or the Bridgewater Treatises, or mention of Abyssinia, Argynnis, Alopecurus, Adenia, or Blennenteritis

Contents of the present volume The present volume contains the words beginning with the letters A and B. The total number of these—including the Main words, treated each in a separate article (e.g. Air), the subordinate entries of distinct forms of words (e.g. Aimont), which appear also in their alphabetical place, with a reference to the main form under which they are treated, and the special combinations or compounds (such as air-line), explained under the Main words—amounts to 31,254. This, however, does not include the simple combinations of obvious meaning (such as air-breathing, air-built, air-current, air-passage), which are mentioned and illustrated under the Main words. The number of these combinations is practically unlimited, since they ca be formed at will; if the examples of the more important of them here given and illustrated by quotations ai also reckoned in, the number of words dealt with in this volume exceeds 40,000. But, confining our attentio to the 31,254 words, we find them thus distributed, in the two letters:

	Main words.	Special combinations	Subordinate words.	Total
A	12,183	1,112	1,828	15,123
B	10,049	3,180	2,902	16,131
In the Vol.	22,232	4,292	4,730	31,254

The Main words, considered as to their status, are approximately divided into those still current, thos which are obsolete, and those which are imperfectly naturalized or alien. The distribution of these, in the tw letters, is as follows:

	Current	Obsolete	Alien.	Total.
A	8,184	3,449	550	12,183
B	7,196	2,533	320	10,049
In the Vol.	15,380	5,982	870	22,232

The Main words are, it is seen, less numerous in B than in A. In most dictionaries, accordingly B occupies less space than A. Thus, in Bailey (8vo, 1721), A occupies 75 pages, B 45; in Johnson (Folio, 1773) A 69, B 58; in Webster (4to, 1864), A 99, B 81; in Ogilvie's Imperial (8vo, 1885), A 196, B 166 In this Dictionary, on the other hand, A fills 603; B, 637 pages. This difference arises from the diversity in the historical character of the words under the two letters respectively, and the effect which this has upon the relative space required by them in a dictionary which deals with the language historically. A has a very small proportion of native English or Teutonic words, and a very large proportion of words from Latin (directly or through French), and from Greek; B has a much smaller number of words from these sources, and a very large proportion of native Teutonic words. Thus, A contains the words formed with the Latin ab-, ad- (ac-, ag- al-, an-, ap-, as-, at-), ante-, and the Greek ἀ-, ἀντι-, ἀπο-, αὐτο-; also the words beginning with æ-, au-, av-, which are almost exclusively from these languages; but it has few radical words of Old English origin, of the type of A, AFTER, AGAIN, ALE, AND, ANSWER, AS, AT. B, on the other hand, contains many of the most important native radical verbs, as BAKE, BE, BEAT, BEND, BID, BIDE, BIND, BITE, BLAZE, BLESS, BLOW, BOW, BRAID, BREAK, BREED, BRING, BROOK, BURN, BURST, BUY; an immense number of substantives of the same character, as BALE, BALK, BANE, BANK, BARK, BARN, BATH, BEAD, BEAM, BED, BELL, BENCH, BILL, BIRD, BIT, BLADE, BLOOD, BLOOM, BOARD, BOAT, BODY, BOND, BONE, BOOK, BOROUGH, BOW, BOWL, BREAD, BREAST, BREATH, BRIDE, BRIDGE, BROOD, BROTHER, BROW, BULL, BURDEN; such adjectives as BAD, BALD, BARE, BEST, BETTER, BIG, BITTER, BLACK, BLEAK, BLIND, BLUNT, BOLD, BOTH, BRIGHT, BROAD, BROWN, BUSY; the important relational words BUT, BY, BEFORE, BEHIND, BETWEEN, BEYOND, etc. Words such as these, which have been in the language since the beginning, with their long history, great variety of form, and many ramifications of meaning to be illustrated, having also many compounds with special meanings to be explained, necessarily take up much more space than words that came into the language only in the 15th, 16th, or 17th century, and have since received but little development of meaning, and scarcely any of form. The Old English words are reinforced, moreover, by an array of words from Old French, many of which, as BATTLE, BEAST, BEAUTY, BEEF, BILL, BLUE, BONNET, BORDER, BOSS, BOUND, BOWL[2], BRACE, BRAVE, BRIBE, BRUISE, BRUSH, BUTT, BUTTON, are now no less 'native', and no less important constituents of our vocabulary, than the Teutonic words. Hence, the average length of the articles in B is greater than that of those in A. and the space occupied by B, as a whole, is greater than that occupied by A.

It is worth noticing that the obsolete words in B (25·2%) do not attain to the proportion of those i in A (28·3%): fewer of the Old English and Norman words have dropped out of use, than of the much more recent learned importations of the Renascence, which, after a short literary life, perished before the end of the 17th century. It is also worthy of note that, of the whole English Vocabulary on record since the 12th century (so far as A and B show), more than three-fourths is still in current use. This is largely owing, no doubt, to the circumstance that the vocabulary of the present day is itself much more extensive than that of any former epoch; but, after all allowance has been made for this, the general fact furnishes striking evidence of the continuity and general identity of our language during seven centuries.

The letters A and B differ in another respect. While the former contains only some half-dozen words of which the derivation presents any points of doubt or difficulty, the words in B are full of etymological problems which have taxed the efforts of all investigators Every one of these problems has here received a fresh and independent investigation, in the light of the latest philological knowledge[1], and with the assistance of the ablest living philologists; and the result has been the discovery of new facts, or the elimination of old errors, in regard to many words. But many of these problems are insoluble· the historical evidence necessary for their solution is either insufficient or entirely absent Many of these words have no kin in other languages, but stand quite alone in English, and, it cannot be doubted, are more or less recent creations of English itself—instances of onomatopœia in its true etymological sense of 'name-creation'. For B contains many illustrations of the fact, which has of late years powerfully impressed itself upon philological students, that the creative period of language, the epoch of 'roots', has never come to an end. The 'origin of language' is not to be sought merely in a far-off Indo-European antiquity, or in a still earlier pre-Aryan yore-time; it is still in perennial process around us. A literary language, with its more accessible store of words already in use and sufficient for all ordinary requirements, its more permanent memories and traditions, its constant appeals to an authoritative precedent —'Where did you find that word? Can you cite it from any of the masters of English Prose? Is it in the Dictionary? Is it English at all?'—is hostile to word-creation. The new word is apt to die almost as soon as born, ashamed of its own newness, ashamed of the italics or inverted commas which apologize for its very existence, or question its legitimacy. But such is not the case with language in its natural state, where words are estimated simply as they serve their purpose of communicating the thought or feeling of the moment, and where memory, and tradition, and precedent are only contributories to the fulfilment of this function. The unwritten dialects, and, to some extent, even slang, and colloquial speech, approach in character to language in its natural state, aiming only at being expressive, and treating memory and precedent as ministers, not as masters. In the local dialects, then, in slang, and in colloquial use, new vocables and new expressions may at any time be abruptly brought forth to serve the needs of the moment, in accordance with feelings of inherent natural fitness, of imitative suggestiveness, or of subtle instinctive analogy with groups of words or parts of words already familiar. Some of these, sooner or later, pass from conversational, into epistolary, journalistic, and finally into general literary use, or from the colloquy of the novel into the literary composition of the novelist, and are registered in the dictionary as 'new words', the origin of which is searched for as vainly in the 'word-hoard' of Old English speech, or even the fullest vocabulary of Indo-European roots, as in a school manual of Latin and Greek roots and affixes. The dialect Glossaries abound in words of this kind; and, among those to be found in these pages, bam, bamboozle, bang, bash, bilk, binge, birl, birsle, birr, blab, blabber, blad, blare, blash, blatter, blear, bleb, blight, blizzard, blob, blore, blot, blotch, blowse, blub, blubber, bluff, blunder, blunt, blur, blurt, bluster, blather, blutter, bob (in some senses), bodge, bogus, boom (in some senses), bore, bosh, bother, bounce, box (a blow), brash, brunt, bub, bum, bumble, bump, bunch, bungle, burr, bustle, buzz, are words which, so far as we know, cannot be traced to any ancient 'roots', but are, for the most part at least, examples of more or less recent word-creation.

Treatment of particular groups of words.

The necessity of compression, in order to keep the Dictionary within reasonable bounds, has been continually present to the Editor, and has led to the employment of a condensed arrangement in groups of related technical terms of Natural History or other sciences, as in ANISO-, ARSEN-, BROMO-, BRONCHO- (where it is hoped that brevity has been attained without any sacrifice of clearness), and to the method employed in the articles ANTI- and BE-. The combinations of ANTI- are more than 500, those of BE- (current and obsolete) nearly 1500 in number, both with indefinite capabilities of extension in the direction of combinations like anti-slavery, anti-vaccination, anti-coercionist, anti-Lacrosser, bebooted, bemuslined, beperi-

[1] Here, the Etymologisches Worterbuch der Deutschen Sprache of F Kluge, and the Etymologisch Woordenboek der Nederlandsche Taal of Johannes Franck, which have been published, in whole or part, since this work was begun, have been of great use, as presenting the latest results attained in German and Dutch etymology wigged, be-uncled, bebishop, beduchess, becobweb; and, if every such combination had been separately set forth in its alphabetical place among the Main words, the size of this volume would have been seriously increased. It has seemed sufficient, therefore, in each case, that all those words (about 300 in ANTI-, and 850 in BE-) which appear to demand separate treatment, whether by virtue of their meaning, their long history, or frequent modern use, should be treated in their alphabetical order among other words; the remainder, of rare or unique occurrence, trivial importance, or obvious meaning, being arranged in groups under the various meanings or uses of the prefix, where each can be studied in connexion with words of similar formation. Each is, in general, provided also with at least one quotation, so as to show by whom and in what connexion, it has been used

Admission or exclusion of proper names, etc.

In dealing with so vast a body of words, some inconsistencies, real or apparent, are, from the nature of the subject, inevitable. Thus, in deciding whether a word on or near the frontier line in any direction shall or shall not be included, it is not easy always to be consistent with what has been done in analogous cases; and it is impossible to anticipate what may have been done in other cases which may yet arise. For example, the word African was one of the earliest instances in which the question of admission or exclusion arose with regard to an important adjective derived from a geographical proper name. After much careful consideration, and consultation with advisers, it was decided (perhaps by a too rigid application of first principles) to omit the word, as having really no more claims to inclusion than Algerian, Austrian, or Bulgarian. But, when American was reached, some months afterwards, it was seen that Americanize and Americanism must of necessity be included, and that these (with 'the Americanizing of our institutions') could not be explained without treating American, and explaining its restricted application to the United States. American was accordingly admitted. Then the question arose, whether the exclusion of African was consistent with the inclusion of American. but the question came too late; African had been actually omitted, on its own merits And the inconsistency is only on the surface; American is included, not on its own account, but to help to the better explanation of derived words; and, in every analogous case, it will be found that a proper noun, or adjective thence formed, is included, not for its own sake and as a proper noun, etc., but because it either has other uses, or has derivatives for the explanation of which it is of importance. Every such word must, in fact, be looked upon as exceptionally included, and not as forming a precedent for the inclusion of other words of the same class.

Similar remarks might be made concerning other classes of words lying on the various diverging lines in which the vocabulary extends: on each of these there is a wide fringe of words as to which it is difficult to say whether they ought or ought not to be treated in an English Dictionary. Nearly every day this question has had to be decided for some word for which a quotation or quotations lay before us, or which actually appears in some modern dictionaries. Every such doubtful case has had to be settled on its own merits; with careful consideration of the evidence as to its use, and of the critical opinion of literary advisers And in such cases it has not always been possible to establish or follow precedents, or to avoid apparent inconsistencies.

Words of unsettled spelling.

Many of the words here treated are, in current use, spelt in more ways than one. This diversity naturally existed in the case of nearly all the words that became obsolete before the prevalence of the modern tendency to uniformity of spelling, which followed upon the introduction of Printing, and has become more and more marked as the influence of the printing-press has extended. Hence it still continues with archaic words which are no longer in ordinary use, but are maintained in a kind of artificial life in ballads, historical novels, and other compositions that affect the phraseology of former times; also, with names of things, customs, actions, etc., which are actually obsolete, but are frequently mentioned in historical and antiquarian treatises: in such cases, modern writers reflect the variety of spelling which they find in the authors who wrote when the words were still part of the living speech. Examples of such words are to aby, acton, alfin, almoign, arbalest, arquebus, auncel, baldric, balinger, barrat, battel, baudekin, borrel, brigandine, brinie, broch, burd, by-coket, byrlaw, byrthynsak (for other spellings of which see the articles themselves). The same diversity prevails in the spelling of words that either have arisen in Lowland Scotch, and English local dialects, or have lived on there when they became obsolete elsewhere, and now often appear, in various circumstances, in general literature, or are actually passing back into the common language: the dialects have no standard orthography; and the words belonging to them appear in many diverse forms. To this class belong such words as ablings, anbury, bargham, barghest, bauchle, baudrons, to beek, beestings, bever, bield, to big, bigg, to birsle, blae, bletherskate, bogie, bogy, bonally, bonny, boosy, brecham, brimse, brough, burdly, bullyrag, byre, and many others. Still more is uniformity of spelling wanting in words belonging to foreign languages, especially to those which do not use the Roman alphabet. Here the forms in use are the result of a multitude of imperfect, conflicting, and even contradictory modes of transliteration or phonetic representation. Among words of this class are alcoran, aga, alchitran, alkekengi, anatta, archil, assagai, attar, baksheesh, barbecue, bashaw, Bengali, besonio, bhang, bidri, bilander, biltong, Brahmin, brinjal, buccan, bungalow, burnous, etc., etc. But there are also many words fully naturalized, or even native, which, from having belonged to one or other of these classes, or from other causes, are still spelt in more than one way Among those in this volume are abbot (abbat), aerie (aery, eyrie, etc), aline (align), ambassage (embassage), ambry (aumbry), aweless (awless), ay (aye), aye (ay), balk (baulk), bourn (bourne), brier (briar), browse (browze), etc, etc. And there are whole series of words in -able (e.g blamable, blameable), in -eer, -ier (e.g bandoleer, -ier), in -ize (-ise), and other endings, as to which current usage varies.

The first aim of the Dictionary, in all such words, is to exhibit the actual variety of usage, as a part of their current history: this is done by means of the quotations, in which the diversity is faithfully represented. But, since it is also the plan of the work to treat each word, as far as possible, once for all, under the Main form (or at least under one form), while the various forms just referred to come more or less far apart in alphabetical order, e.g. beaver bever, ambry aumbry, arquebus harquebus, coran koran qoran, it is necessary to choose some one form as that under which the word, as a whole, shall be treated. In making this choice, regard is had chiefly to the preponderance of modern usage, when this is distinctly marked; when usage is more or less equally divided, considerations of etymological or phonetic propriety, of general analogy with similar words, or of practical convenience, are taken into account; but, in many cases, it is not implied that the form actually chosen is intrinsically better than others which are appended to it, and which also occur in their alphabetical places with cross-references. Where a decided reason of any kind exists for giving a preference to a particular spelling, this is briefly stated at the end of the etymology, especially is this done in the few cases where the spelling preferred (e.g ax, connexion, rime) is not that at present favoured by the preponderance of usage, but is intrinsically the best, and therefore is recommended. The spelling of particular endings, as -BLE (-able, -eable, -ible), -EER, -IER, -IZE, is discussed under these suffixes. In this work -IZE, whenever it represents, historically or analogically, the Greek -ίζειν, late Latin -izāre, is, on etymological as well as phonetic grounds, uniformly used, to the exclusion of -ise, which is only the French spelling of the same Greek ending, as in anatomiser, baptiser, barbariser, catéchiser. As the French always represent the Greek -ίζειν by -iser, they are, of course, quite consistent in using the same form for new verbs, as civiliser, carboniser: equally consistent and appropriate is it for us, in English, to write civilize, after barbarize; Calvinize and Ionize after Hellenize, Judaize, and idolize.

Unsettled Pronunciation.

From the composite character of the English Vocabulary, the pronunciation, also, of many words is in a very unsettled state. This is the fact not merely with words from other modern languages, the pronunciation of which depends largely upon the linguistic knowledge and taste of the person who uses them, but also with derivatives from Latin or Greek, for which there exist two or more analogies, one perhaps supplied by the treatment which historical words of the type have normally received when derived through Old French, another supplied by classical Latin quantity. Examples of this occur in words in -ary, -ory, such as accessory, catenary, centenary, millenary, promontory, secretary, sublunary, where stress upon the fourth syllable from the end is the preponderating custom, and obtains with the longer-established words; but, in newer words, many put the stress upon the third syllable from the end; and, when a word is merely scholarly, this is apt to remain the usual pronunciation, as in catē'nary as opposed to pu'lmonary, where the Latin forms catēnā'rius, pulmōnā'rius, are, in every respect, upon the same level. This conflict of analogies, or the absence of any analogy, appears still more in purely scientific words, in which there may be said to be no general standard of pronunciation. The Editor was once present at a meeting of a learned society, where, in the course of discussion, he heard the word gaseous systematically pronounced in six different ways by as many eminent physicists. If this was possible with a word which, though comparatively new, was even then sufficiently popular to have attained to some standard pronunciation, how much more it is so with words such as acetamine, which have no popular currency, and which indeed were made, not primarily to be spoken, but to be used in books, and as to the pronunciation of which, or the question whether they are pronounceable, no thought was given by their makers? On several occasions, the Editor has applied directly to the introducer of a word, to know how he pronounces it, or means it to be pronounced, and has received the answer, that he has never thought of its pronunciation, does not presume to say how it ought to be pronounced, and leaves it to people to pronounce as they like, or to the DICTIONARY to say what is the right pronunciation. This, of course, reverses the natural order of language, in which speech comes first, and writing is only its symbolization; for here the first thing is the written symbol addressed to the eye (and reminding the reader perhaps more or less distinctly of other written symbols which are to be found in the Greek Lexicon), while, for 'pronunciation', anything passes muster which suffices to recall the written symbol in question, just as any reading of a mathematical formula passes muster, if it enables an auditor to write down the formula again. In dealing with words in which two or more pronunciations are current, these pronunciations are given in the Dictionary, in the case of those in which no standard exists, an attempt has been made to follow analogies so far as they go, and at least to mark the place of the stress; but sometimes it has not been possible to do even this.

The preparation of this volume has taken a much longer time than any of the promoters of the work anticipated. The time has been consumed chiefly in two directions: first, with the larger articles, as those on AT, BY, BUT, BE, BEAR, BREAK, the construction of which has occupied many days, sometimes even weeks. The mere study of the result, arranged in some degree of order, gives little idea of the toil and difficulties encountered in bringing into this condition what was at first a shapeless mass of many thousand quotations. And in this part of the work there was practically no assistance to be got from the labours of our predecessors; the attempt has never been made before to exhibit such a combined logical and historical view of the sense-development of English words. Our own attempts lay no claim to perfection; but they represent the most that could be done in the time and with the data at our command. The other direction in which much time has been consumed is the elucidation of the meaning of obscure terms, sometimes obsolete, sometimes current, belonging to matters of history, customs, fashions, trade, or manufactures. In many cases, the only thing known about these was contained in the quotations, often merely allusive, which had been collected by the diligence of our readers They were to be found in no dictionary, or, if mentioned in some, were explained in a way which our quotations evidently showed to be erroneous. The difficulty of obtaining first-hand and authoritative information about these has often been immense, and sometimes insurmountable. Ten, twenty, or thirty letters have sometimes been written to persons who, it was thought, might possibly know, or succeed in finding out, something definite on the subject; and often weeks have passed, and 'copy' advanced into the state of 'proof', 'proof' into 'revise', and 'revise' even into 'final', before any results could be obtained. It is incredible what labour has had to be expended, sometimes, to find out the facts for an article which occupies not more than five or six lines, or even to be able to write the words "Derivation unknown", as the net outcome of hours of research and of testing the statements put forth without hesitation in other works.

Dr. Johnson's Experiences.

These experiences have often called to mind the classical words in which Dr. Johnson recounts in his Preface his similar difficulties: "When first I engaged in this work, I resolved to leave neither words nor things unexamined, and pleased myself with a prospect of the hours which I should revel away in feasts of literature, with the obscure recesses of northern learning which I should enter and ransack, the treasures with which I expected every search into those neglected mines to reward my labour, and the triumph with which I should display my acquisitions to mankind. When I had thus enquired into the original of words, I resolved to show likewise my attention to things; to pierce deep into every science, to enquire the nature of every substance of which I inserted the name, to limit every idea by a definition strictly logical, and exhibit every production of art or nature in an accurate description, that my book might be in place of all other dictionaries whether appellative or technical. But these were the dreams of a poet doomed at last to wake a lexicographer. I soon found that it is too late to look for instruments, when the work calls for execution, and that whatever abilities I had brought to my task, with those I must finally perform it. To deliberate whenever I doubted, to enquire whenever I was ignorant, would have protracted the undertaking without end, and, perhaps, without much improvement; for I did not find by my first experiments, that what I had not of my own was easily to be obtained: I saw that one enquiry only gave occasion to another, that book referred to book, that to search was not always to find, and to find was not always to be informed; and that thus to pursue perfection, was, like the first inhabitants of Arcadia, to chase the sun, which, when they had reached the hill where he seemed to rest, was still beheld at the same distance from them I then contracted my design, determining to confide in myself, and no longer to solicit auxiliaries, which produced more incumbrance than assistance: by this I obtained at least one advantage, that I set limits to my work, which would in time be ended, though not completed."

Assistance received.

If the present writer has been more successful than Dr. Johnson in finding what he searched for, it has been owing to the ready good-will and helpful co-operation of many scholars and specialists, most of them men whose time is much occupied, but whose interest in this undertaking has led them willingly to place some of it at the Editor's service, and freely to contribute of their knowledge to the perfection of the work. It has not, as a rule, been possible to submit to contributors or revisers the articles for which their assistance was asked; it will, therefore, be understood that none of the foregoing are responsible for the use made of their help in the Dictionary. If they have been misunderstood or misrepresented, the Editor alone must bear the blame.

Still warmer acknowledgements are due to those gentlemen who, not occasionally, or for special words, but systematically and continuously, have read the proofs, to improve the work as a whole by criticism, or to enrich it by additions. And first of all, and above all others, to Mr. Fitzedward Hall, D.C.L., who, as a voluntary and gratuitous service to the history of the English Language, has devoted four hours daily to a critical examination of the proof-sheets, and the filling up of deficiencies, whether in the vocabulary or the quotations. Those who are familiar with the pages of his Modern English, his English Adjectives in -able, and his numerous articles and papers on special points of English, know with what an amazing wealth of evidence the author illustrates the history of every word, idiom, or grammatical usage, upon which he touches; the whole of his stock of quotations, references, and indices, he has generously placed at the service of the Dictionary, and there is scarcely a page to which he has not added earlier instances of words or senses than those which our Readers had found, many rare words and rare senses have been added entirely from his stores. Mr. Henry Hucks Gibbs has also read all the proofs from the commencement of the work, and enriched them systematically by valuable criticism and additions, many articles owe much of their accuracy and completeness to his assiduous care. The Rev. J. B Johnston, B.D., of Glasgow, has also read all the proofs since the beginning of B; and this voluntary help has been specially valuable from the experience in the practical work of the Dictionary which he had previously gained as an assistant in the Scriptorium. Professor Eduard Sievers has read, in proof, all the etymological articles on Teutonic words, besides advising the Editor in the preparation of the more difficult ones, to the accuracy and completeness of which he has made many additions. M. Paul Meyer has similarly contributed to the correctness of the etymological articles on Romanic words, and has revised the proofs of the more difficult ones which have been submitted to him. Dr F. J. Furnivall has been constant with his help on all points requiring further investigation, and, by personal search in the British Museum Library and elsewhere, has saved the Editor many hours of work.

The following portions, before being finally taken in hand by the Editor and his staff in the Scriptorium, were sub-edited by the lady and gentlemen here named, whose gratuitous services were an important contribution to the accomplishment of the work.

I have also to acknowledge the collaboration, in parts of this volume, of Mr. Henry Bradley, whose editorial work was more particularly devoted to part of the words in Bo-, Br-, and Bu-. Those who have assisted in the Scriptorium with Volume I, or parts of it, are Mr. Alfred Erlebach, B.A., Mr. John Mitchell, the Rev. J. B. Johnston, M.A., B.D., Mr G. F. H. Sykes, B.A., Mr. F. E. Bumby, Mr Walter Worrall, B.A., Mr. A. T. Maling, B.A., Mr. R. H. Lord, M.A., Mr. C. G. Balk, Mr. H. F. P. Ruthven, Mr. C. G. Crump, B.A., and Mr. G. Parker, whose services are gratefully acknowledged.

After all the help which has been received, and which has contributed so much to the completeness of the Dictionary, the element of time still remains inexorable, it is still, as in the days of Dr. Johnson, imperative that limits be set to research, in order that the work may 'in time be ended, though not completed'. Accordingly, since the close of Volume I, it has been the aim of the Editor and his staff to maintain such a regular rate of progress as will ensure the production of one Part a year. As Mr Henry Bradley (whose co-operation in the present volume is mentioned above) is now at work independently, with a staff of assistants, on a third volume, there is reasonable ground to expect that the production of the work henceforth will be twice as rapid as it has been hitherto.

Several collections of quotations for rare words or senses, which had been formed, in some cases, with the intention of independent publication, have been generously given to the Dictionary, by Prof G Stephens, of Copenhagen, the Rev. Addison Crofton, Stockport (collected by his late father-in-law); the Rev. Kirby Trimmer, Norwich; Mrs Hodgson, Bonaly Tower, Midlothian (collected by the late Prof W. B Hodgson), Mr Alex Smith, Langside, Glasgow (transcripts from MSS. collected by the late Mr. J. Payne Collier); a series of MSS. additions to Halliwell (from early wills), by Mr J Challenor-Smith, Probate Registry, Somerset Ho ; a series of references for early instances of French words in Middle English, by Mons F J Amours, Glasgow The Rev. T. L O Davies, M.A., who had already published his Supplementary English Glossary, has desired that work to be treated as a contribution to the Dictionary, and has presented all his subsequent gleanings to it. The quotations which we use from Mr Davies's printed work are, as in similar cases, distinguished by (D.) Col. Yule was similarly good enough to put at our disposal the proofs of his Glossary of Anglo-Indian Colloquial Terms, as it was passing through the press. Quotations thence supplied are marked (Y.)

GENERAL EXPLANATIONS.

THE VOCABULARY.

THE Vocabulary of a widely-diffused and highly-cultivated living language is not a fixed quantity circumscribed by definite limits. That vast aggregate of words and phrases which constitutes the Vocabulary of English-speaking men presents, to the mind that endeavours to grasp it as a definite whole, the aspect of one of those nebulous masses familiar to the astronomer, in which a clear and unmistakable nucleus shades off on all sides, through zones of decreasing brightness, to a dim marginal film that seems to end nowhere, but to lose itself imperceptibly in the surrounding darkness. In its constitution it may be compared to one of those natural groups of the zoologist or botanist, wherein typical species forming the characteristic nucleus of the order, are linked on every side to other species, in which the typical character is less and less distinctly apparent, till it fades away in an outer fringe of aberrant forms, which merge imperceptibly in various surrounding orders, and whose own position is ambiguous and uncertain. For the convenience of classification, the naturalist may draw the line, which bounds a class or order, outside or inside of a particular form, but Nature has drawn it nowhere. So the English Vocabulary contains a nucleus or central mass of many thousand words whose 'Anglicity' is unquestioned; some of them only literary, some of them only colloquial, the great majority at once literary and colloquial,—they are the Common Words of the language. But they are linked on every side with other words which are less and less entitled to this appellation, and which pertain ever more and more distinctly to the domain of local dialect, of the slang and cant of 'sets' and classes, of the peculiar technicalities of trades and processes, of the scientific terminology common to all civilized nations, of the actual languages of other lands and peoples. And there is absolutely no defining line in any direction: the circle of the English language has a well-defined centre but no discernible circumference*. Yet practical utility has some bounds, and a Dictionary has definite limits: the lexicographer must, like the naturalist, 'draw the line somewhere', in each diverging direction. He must include all the 'Common Words' of literature and conversation, and such of the scientific, technical, slang, dialectal, and foreign words as are passing into common use, and approach the position or standing of 'common words', well knowing that the line which he draws will not satisfy all his critics. For to every man the domain of 'common words' widens out in the direction of his own reading, research, business, provincial or foreign residence, and contracts in the direction with which he has no practical connexion: no one man's English is all English. The lexicographer must be satisfied to exhibit the greater part of the vocabulary of each one, which will be immensely more than the whole vocabulary of any one.

In addition to, and behind, the common vocabulary, in all its diverging lines, lies an infinite number of Proper or merely denotative names, outside the province of lexicography, yet touching it in thousands of points, at which these names, and still more the adjectives and verbs formed upon them, acquire more or less of connotative value. Here also limits more or less arbitrary must be assumed

* The above diagram will explain itself, as an attempt to express to the eye the aspect in which the Vocabulary is here presented, and also some of the relations of its elements typical and aberrant The centre is occupied by the 'common' words, in which literary and colloquial usage meet. 'Scientific' and 'foreign' words enter the common language mainly through literature, 'slang' words ascend through colloquial use; the 'technical' terms of crafts and processes, and the 'dialect' words, blend with the common language both in speech and literature Slang also touches on one side the technical terminology of trades and occupations, as in 'nautical slang,' 'Public School slang,' 'the slang of the Stock Exchange,' and on another passes into true dialect. Dialects similarly pass into foreign languages. Scientific terminology passes on one side into purely foreign words, on another it blends with the technical vocabulary of art and manufactures. It is not possible to fix the point at which the 'English Language' stops, along any of these diverging lines.

The Language presents yet another undefined frontier, when it is viewed in relation to time. The living vocabulary is no more permanent in its constitution than definite in its extent. It is not to-day what it was a century ago, still less what it will be a century hence. Its constituent elements are in a state of slow but incessant dissolution and renovation 'Old words' are ever becoming obsolete and dying out: 'new words' are continually pressing in. And the death of a word is not an event of which the date can be readily determined It is a vanishing process, extending over a lengthened period, of which contemporaries never see the end. Our own words never become obsolete: it is always the words of our grandfathers that have died with them. Even after we cease to use a word, the memory of it survives, and the word itself survives as a possibility, it is only when no one is left to whom its use is still possible, that the word is wholly dead. Hence, there are many words of which it is doubtful whether they are still to be considered as part of the living language; they are alive to some speakers, and dead to others. And, on the other hand, there are many claimants to admission into the recognized vocabulary (where some of them will certainly one day be received), that are already current coin with some speakers and writers, and not yet 'good English', or even not English at all, to others.

If we treat the division of words into current and obsolete as a subordinate one, and extend our idea of the Language so as to include all that has been English from the beginning, or from any particular epoch, we enter upon a department of the subject, of which, from the nature of the case, our exhibition must be imperfect. For the vocabulary of past times is known to us solely from its preservation in written records; the extent of our knowledge of it depends entirely upon the completeness of the records, and the completeness of our acquaintance with them. And the farther back we go, the more imperfect are the records, the smaller is the fragment of the actual vocabulary that we can recover.

Subject to the conditions which thus encompass every attempt to construct a complete English Dictionary, the present work aims at exhibiting the history and signification of the English words now in use, or known to have been in use since the middle of the twelfth century This date has been adopted as the only natural halting-place, short of going back to the beginning, so as to include the entire Old English or 'Anglo-Saxon' Vocabulary To do this would have involved the inclusion of an immense number of words, not merely long obsolete but also having obsolete inflexions, and thus requiring, if dealt with at all, a treatment different from that adapted to the words which survived the twelfth century. For not only was the stream of English literature then reduced to the tiniest thread (the slender annals of the Old English or Anglo-Saxon Chronicle being for nearly a century its sole representative), but the vast majority of the ancient words that were destined not to live into modern English, comprising the entire scientific, philosophical, and poetical vocabulary of Old English, had already disappeared, and the old inflexional and grammatical system had been levelled to one so essentially modern as to require no special treatment in the Dictionary. Hence we exclude all words that had become obsolete by 1150. But to words actually included this date has no application; their history is exhibited from their first appearance, however early.

Within these chronological limits, it is the aim of the Dictionary to deal with all the common words of speech and literature, and with all words which approach these in character; the limits being extended farther in the domain of science and philosophy, which naturally passes into that of literature, than in that of slang or cant, which touches the colloquial. In scientific and technical terminology, the aim has been to include all words English in form, except those of which an explanation would be unintelligible to any but the specialist; and such words, not English in form, as either are in general use, like Hippopotamus, Geranium, Aluminium, Focus, Stratum, Bronchitis, or belong to the more familiar language of science, as Mammalia, Lepidoptera, Invertebrata.

Down to the Fifteenth Century the language existed only in dialects, all of which had a literary standing: during this period, therefore, words and forms of all dialects are admitted on an equal footing into the Dictionary. Dialectal words and forms which occur since 1500 are not admitted, except when they continue the history of a word or sense once in general use, illustrate the history of a literary word, or have themselves a certain literary currency, as is the case with many modern Scottish words. It is true that the dialectal words are mostly genuine English, and that they are an essential part of the contents of a Lexicon totius Anglicitatis, but the work of collecting them has not yet been completed; and, even when they shall have been collected, the phonetic variety in which they exist in different localities, and the want of any fixed written forms round which to group the variations, will require a method of treatment different from that applicable to the words of the literary language, which have an accepted uniform spelling and an approximately uniform pronunciation

CLASSIFICATION OF THE VOCABULARY.

For the purposes of treatment in this Dictionary, words and phrases are classed as: (1) Main Words, (2) Subordinate Words, (3) Combinations. MAIN WORDS comprise (1) all single words, radical or derivative (e. g Ant, Amphitheatrically), (2) all those compound words (and phrases) which, from their meaning, history, or importance, claim to be treated in separate articles (e. g. Afternoon, Almighty, Almsman, Air-pump, Aitch-bone, Ale-house, Forget-me-not, Adam's apple, All fours). The articles in which these are treated constitute the Main Articles. SUBORDINATE WORDS include variant and obsolete forms of Main Words, and such words of bad formation, doubtful existence, or alleged use, as it is deemed proper, on any ground, to record. The Main and Subordinate Words are arranged in a single alphabetic series, the former being printed in a larger, the latter in a smaller type. COMBINATIONS, when so simple as either to require no explanation, or to be capable of being briefly explained in connexion with their cognates, are dealt with under the Main Words which form their first element, their treatment forming the concluding part of the Main Article.

MAIN WORDS.

Every Main Word is treated, once for all, under its modern current or most usual spelling; or, if obsolete, under the most typical of its latest spellings, the form or spelling thus chosen being considered the Main Form of the word.

Occasionally a form or spelling of an obsolete word has been assumed, which is not actually found in the quotations adduced, but is in accordance with the usual analogies of the language, as seen in kindred words. Thus Annoyously is given as the Main Form, on the analogy of annoy, annoyous, although only anoyously has actually been found.

All other important forms of each word, current or obsolete, are entered in their alphabetical order, as Subordinate Words, and are there concisely referred to the Main Form under which they are treated.

When a word which is historically one has different grammatical relations, it is treated as one word only, and the different relations are indicated by the division of the article into sections (marked A, B, C) This refers especially to substantives used also attributively (or adjectively), as in 'an ounce of gold, a gold watch, gold-coloured scales'; to adjectives used substantively or pronominally, as in 'the catholic church, a good catholic, that book, that is mine, the words that he spoke', to adjectives used adverbially, as in 'the according voice of national wisdom', 'he acted according to orders'; to adverbs, prepositions, and conjunctions, originally the same word, as ABOUT, AFTER, SINCE, AS, and of course à fortiori to verbs used transitively and intransitively, as 'to abide battle, to abide at home,' which, in some dictionaries, are reckoned as two distinct words.

In this Dictionary, transitive and intransitive seldom appear even as leading divisions of a verb, but, in accordance with the actual history of the word, in most cases only as varying and often temporary constructions, subordinate to the different senses, and liable to pass one into the other in the development of the language Thus a verb at one time intransitive finally takes a simple object, through the phonetic decay of a dative or genitive ending, or the elision of a preposition, and is accounted transitive, without any change either in form or meaning (e g ANSWER), and a verb used transitively, likewise without change of meaning and form at length becomes intransitive, through the regular modern English suppression of the reflexive pronoun (e g Ezek xx. 22 I withdrew mine hand, Mark iii. 7 Jesus withdrew himself to the sea, Revised Version, Jesus withdrew to the sea) The history of ANSWER or WITHDRAW would be misrepresented by splitting them each into two words, or even by classifying their senses in a manner which would conceal these historical relations.

But verbs uniform in their stems with substantives or adjectives, as LAND, to LAND, DRY, to DRY, ABSTRACT, to ABSTRACT, are, of course, distinct words; as are adjectives and adverbs which, through 'levelling' of terminations, have become identical in form, though originally distinct, as ALIKE a., ALIKE adv.; and substantives and adjectives which have always been identical in form, but were of separate introduction into the language, and have separate histories, as ANIMAL sb., ANIMAL a. Where a word originally one has been, in the course of its history, split into two, whether with distinction of sense, as ALSO, AS, or merely as synonyms, as ANT, EMMET, APPRENTICE, PRENTICE, both modern forms are treated as separate words, and there is a reference from one article to the other. Where two original words of identical or similar form have coalesced into one, the modern word is treated as one or two, according to practical utility. When they are treated as two words, these come, of course, immediately together: see ALLAY, ALLOW, AMICE

The treatment of a Main Word comprises:—I. The Identification, II. The Morphology, III. The Signification, IV. The Illustrative Quotations.

I. The Identification includes:

1. The Main Form, i. e. the usual or typical spelling, as already described. (In certain cases where two spellings are in current use, both are given in the Main Form, as ANALYSE -YZE, CHEMISTRY CHYMISTRY, INFLECTION INFLEXION.) Words believed to be obsolete are distinguished by prefixing †; non-naturalized or partially-naturalized words, by ‖

In the case of rare words, especially those adopted or formed from Latin equivalents, it is often difficult to say whether they are or are not obsolete. They are permanent possibilities, rarely needed, but capable of being used whenever they are needed, rather than actually discarded terms. To these and other words, of which the obsoleteness is doubtful, the † is not prefixed

As to their citizenship in the language, words may be classed as Naturals, Denizens, Aliens, and Casuals NATURALS include all native words like father, and all fully naturalized words like street, rose, knapsack, gas, parasol DENIZENS are words fully naturalized as to use, but not as to form, inflexion, or pronunciation, as aide-de camp, locus, carte-de-visite, table d'hôte. ALIENS are names of foreign objects, titles, etc, which we require often to use, and for which we have no native equivalents, as shah, geyser, cicerone, targum, backsheesh, sepoy CASUALS are foreign words of the same class, not in habitual use, which for special and temporary purposes occur in books of foreign travel, letters of foreign correspondents, and the like. There are no fixed limits between these classes, and the constant tendency is for words to pass upwards from the last to the first. But, while casuals and aliens from barbarous languages are readily and quickly naturalized, words from French and the learned languages, especially Latin, which are assumed to be known to all the polite, are often kept in the position of denizens for centuries. we still treat phenomenon as Greek, genus as Latin, aide-de-camp as French The words marked with ‖ in the Dictionary comprise Denizens and Aliens, and such Casuals as approach, or formerly approached, the position of these. Opinions will differ as to the claims of some that are included and some that are excluded, and also as to the line dividing Denizens from Naturals, and the position assigned to some words on either side of it If we are to distinguish these classes at all, a line must be drawn somewhere.

2. (Within parentheses) the Pronunciation or symbolization of the actual existing form of the word, as explained hereafter. A recognized difference of pronunciation is also shown, with occasional notes on the diversity. Of Obsolete Words usually no pronunciation is given, but the place of the stress or accent, when ascertained, is indicated by a 'turned period' after the stress-vowel, as Alfe·res, A·nredly. In partially naturalized words two pronunciations are often given, viz. the native (or what passes for the native), and one conformed more or less to English analogies, in actual use many intermediate varieties may be heard, cf. rendez-vous, envelope, environs, prestige, chignon, recitative, Koran, caviare, and the like.

3. The Grammatical Designation, i.e. the Part of Speech, or subdivision of the same, as pers. pron., vbl. sb. See the list of Abbreviations. All words having no Grammatical Designation are substantives· the letters sb. are employed only where required to avoid ambiguity.

4. In words of more or less specific use, the Specification, as Mus. (in Music), Bot. (in Botany), etc.

5. The Status, where there is any peculiarity, as Obs. (obsolete), arch. (archaic or obsolescent), colloq (colloquial), dial. (now dialectal, though formerly in general use: words exclusively dialectal are not inserted, except on special grounds). Here also is added, when applicable, the epithet rare, with $^{-1}$, or $^{-0}$, indicating that only one, or no actual instance of the use of the word is known to us. Words apparently employed only for the nonce, are, when inserted in the Dictionary, marked nonce-wd.

6. The principal earlier Forms or Spellings, with their chronological range indicated by the unit figure of the century, thus 3–6 = 13th to 16th cent.; 1 standing for all centuries down to 1100

These figures also correspond broadly to distinct periods of the language; viz 1 Old English or 'Anglo-Saxon', 2 (12th c) Old English Transition ('semi-Saxon'); 3 (13th c) Early Middle English; 4 (14th c) Late Middle English; 5 (15th c) Middle English Transition, 6 (16th c) Early Modern or Tudor English, 7 (17th c) Middle Modern English; 8, 9 (18th and 19th c) Current English.

7. The Inflexions, i.e. plural of substantives, and principal parts of verbs, when other than the ordinary -s, -ed.

II. The Morphology or Form-History [within heavy square brackets] includes:—1. the Derivation, or Etymology, showing the actual origin of the word, when ascertained. 2. The Subsequent Form-history in English, when this presents special features, as phonetic change, contraction, corruption, perversion by popular etymology or erroneous association. 3. Miscellaneous facts as to the history of the word, its age, obsolescence, revival, refashioning, change of pronunciation, confusion with other words.

In the light of historical Etymology, an English word is (1) The extant formal representative, or direct phonetic descendant, of an earlier word; that is to say, it is the earlier word itself, in a later or more recent form, as it has been unconsciously changed in the mouths of the successive generations that have used it. For example, ACRE (now really ēi·kəɹ), formerly aker, is the extant form of Old English æcer, this the later form of prehistoric æcr, the special English form of acr, akr, this of West Germanic akra, this, through earlier akra-z, of Original Teutonic akro-z, this of original Aryan or Indo-European agro-s; and agros, akroz, akraz, akra, akr, æcr, æcer, aker, āker, ācre (ēi kəɹ), are all merely successive and temporary forms of one and the same word, as employed during successive periods. The word has never died; no year, no day probably, has passed without its being uttered by many: but this constant use has so worn it down and modified its form, that we commonly look upon acre as a distinct word from agros, with which it is connected by many intermediate forms, of which only a few have been discriminated in writing, while the finer and more intimately connecting links have never been written. This phonetic descent is symbolized by (:—); thus ACRE:—OE. æcer:—O.Teut. akro-z.*

If not the extant formal representative of an original Teutonic word, an English word has been (2) adopted (a.), or (3) adapted (ad.), from some foreign language, i.e. it is a word once foreign, but now, without or with intentional change of form, used as English; or it has been (4) formed on or from (f.) native or foreign elements, or from a combination of them. Adoption is essentially a popular process, at work whenever the speakers of one language come into contact with the speakers of another, from whom they acquire foreign things, or foreign ideas, with their foreign names. It has prevailed in English at all periods from the earliest to the latest times: inch, pound, street, rose, cat, prison, algebra, antic, orange, tobacco, tea, canoe, focus, meerschaum, are adopted words. Adaptation is essentially a learned or literary process, it consists in adapting a foreign word to the 'analogies of the language', and so depriving it of its foreign termination. Examples are Latin or Greek words reduced to their stem form, or receiving recognized English endings. Latin words which lived on in Gaul there underwent regular phonetic changes, whereby they at length became 'French'; in this living French form they were adopted in Middle English; but in more recent times numerous Latin words have been taken into English directly, yet modified, in their terminations, in the same way as if they had lived on in French and been thence adopted into English *. Such English words originate in an adaptation of the Latin original, not in an adoption of its French (or other Romance) extant representative. Formation consists in the combination of existing words or parts of words with each other, or with living formatives, i.e. syllables which no longer exist as separate words, but yet have an appreciable signification which they impart to the new product. Formation is the chief natural process by which the vocabulary of a language is increased: it is both popular and learned; in its popular application, it gives such words as

* The French words adopted before 1400 were generally taken from the Anglo-French, or French spoken for several centuries in England, where they had undergone further phonetic change. It was in strict conformity with linguistic facts that Chaucer told of his Prioresse:

'Frenssh she spak ful faire and fetisly,
After the scole of Stratford at-te Bowe,
For frenssh of Parys was to hire vnknowe'

for the Anglo-French dialect of the 14th century was distinct not only from Parisian, but from all dialects of continental French. In its origin a mixture of various Norman and other Northern French dialects, afterwards mixed with and greatly modified by Angevin, Parisian, Poitevin, and other elements, and more and more exposed to the overpowering influence of literary French, it had yet received, on this side the Channel, a distinct and independent development, following, in its phonology especially, English and not continental tendencies As the natural speech of the higher and educated classes, it died out in the fourteenth century; but it maintained a kind of artificial existence for a longer period, and was used (in an increasingly debased form) for writing law-reports down to the 17th century, in which stage it still influenced the spelling of English words Its forms survive in many of our terminations: armour, colour, glorious, gracious, envious, perilous, arrival, espousal, language, enjoy, benefit, gaoler, caitif, are the actual Anglo-French forms, as distinct from those of continental Old and Modern French. As a rule, it may be assumed that the original form of every Middle English word of French origin was identical with the Anglo-French form; and that, where a gap appears between the earliest known English form of a word and its Old French equivalent, that gap would be filled up by the recovery of the Anglo-French and earliest English form. It was not until the fifteenth century, and chiefly at the hands of Caxton, that continental French forms and spellings began directly to influence our language.

black-bird, shep-herd, work-er, high-ness, grand-ly, a-swim, be-moan, after-noon, in learned application, such as con-caten-ation, mono-petal-ous, chloro-phyl, tele-phone, in a mixture of the two, such as acknowledge-ment, lion-ize, starv-ation, betroth-al.

Much of the terminology of modern science is identical, or as nearly so as the forms of the languages permit, in English and French, in English, French, and German, or sometimes even in most of the European languages. It would often be as difficult as useless to ascertain in which language a particular scientific term first appeared in print, this being, linguistically, a mere accident the word was accepted as common property from the beginning. In such cases, modern formation (mod. f.) is employed to intimate that it is uncertain in what modern language, English or continental, the word was first used; it may indeed have occurred first in some modern Latin work, either of English or foreign authorship.

Phonetic descent (:—), adoption (a.), adaptation (ad), word-formation (f.) are usually combined under the term derivation, but, until we know in which of them, singly or in combination, a word has originated, we do not know its Etymology.

In this Dictionary, words originally native are traced to their earliest known English, and, when possible, to their earliest Teutonic form, authenticated and illustrated by the cognate words in other Teutonic languages and dialects; those of foreign origin are referred to the foreign word or elements whence they were immediately adopted or formed. In certain cases these foreign words, especially the French, are themselves traced to their antecedent forms or component elements; but these antecedents are considered only with a view to the clearer comprehension of the history and use of the word in English. To trace the remoter history of these words, and determine their Aryan or other 'roots,' is no part of their English history.

Of many words it has to be stated that their origin is either doubtful or altogether unknown In such cases the historical facts are given, as far as they go, and their bearing occasionally indicated. But conjectural etymologies are rarely referred to, except to point out their agreement or disagreement with the historical facts; for these, and the full discussion which they require, the reader is referred to special treatises on etymology.

III. The Signification (Sematology). Some words have only one invariable signification; but most words that have been used for any length of time in a language have acquired a long and sometimes intricate series of significations, as the primitive sense has been gradually extended to include allied or associated ideas, or transferred boldly to figurative and analogical uses. This happens to a greater extent with relational words, as prepositions (cf About, After, Against, And, Anent) than with notional words, as verbs and nouns; of these, also, it affects verbs and adjectives more than substantives; of substantives, it influences those which express actions, qualities, and mental conceptions (cf. Account), more than those which name, and are, as it were, fixed to material objects. Yet even these latter have often acquired many different senses. Thus, Board names a material object; yet compare: a thin board, a frugal board, a card-board, board and lodgings, passengers on board, to fall over board, to sit at the council board, a board school, the Board of Trade, to tread the boards, a sea-board parish. The order in which these senses were developed is one of the most important facts in the history of the word; to discover and exhibit it are among the most difficult duties of a dictionary which aims at giving this history. If the historical record were complete, that is, if we possessed written examples of all the uses of each word from the beginning, the simple exhibition of these would display a rational or logical development. The historical record is not complete enough to do this, but it is usually sufficient to enable us to infer the actual order. In exhibiting this in the Dictionary, that sense is placed first which was actually the earliest in the language: the others follow in the order in which they appear to have arisen. As, however, the development often proceeded in many branching lines, sometimes parallel, often divergent, it is evident that it cannot be adequately represented in a single linear series. Hence, while the senses are numbered straight on 1, 2, 3, &c., they are also grouped under branches marked I, II, III, &c, in each of which the historical order begins afresh. Subdivisions of the senses, varieties of construction, &c., are marked a, b, c, &c.; subdivisions of these, which rarely occur, (a), (b.), (c.), &c. So far for words of which the senses have been developed in English itself. But in adopted or adapted words which had already acquired various significations in the language (e.g. Latin) from which they were taken, it often happens that the order in which the senses appeared in English does not agree with the natural order in which they were developed in the original language. The English order is in fact accidental. For it was not in the primary sense that the word was first taken into English, but in a figurative, transferred, or specialized use, as an ecclesiastical, legal, grammatical, or medical term, which perhaps took root in our language, and here received a development of its own. Subsequently, however, familiarity with the Latin language and literature sometimes led to a fresh adoption of the word in the primary sense, or to a sudden extension of English usage, so as to include the primary sense, which thus appears as of quite late origin in English. In such a case it is not possible to make the historical order of the senses in English agree with the logical order in which they arose in Latin or other previous language; and every such word must be treated in the way which seems best suited to exhibit the facts of its own history and use. Instances of such words are afforded by ADVENT, AGONY, ANNUNCIATION, APPEND.

Obsolete Senses, like obsolete words, have † prefixed, so as to be at once distinguished from those now in use. Under ¶ are included Catachrestic and erroneous uses, confusions, and the like.

To a great extent the explanations of the meanings have been framed anew upon a study of all the quotations for each word collected for this work, of which those printed form only a small part. But the labours of other scholars in this, the most successfully cultivated department of English lexicography, have not been neglected. In particular, the explanations of Dr. Johnson and of his editor Archdeacon Todd have often been adopted unchanged (within inverted commas and marked J. or T.), as have those of N. Bailey, and other early lexicographers, to whom it is only right to give credit for original work which has become the common property of all their successors.

IV. The Quotations illustrate the forms and uses of the word, showing the age of the word generally, and of its various senses particularly; the earliest and, in obsolete words or senses, the latest, known instances of its occurrence being always quoted. Except in special cases, where the letters of the Greek alphabet, α, β, γ, &c are used to separate parallel forms, the illustration of the forms is subordinated to that of the senses: the quotations illustrating each sense immediately follow the explanation. They are arranged chronologically, so as to give about one for each century, though various considerations often render a larger number necessary. The original spelling is retained, as an essential part of the history of the language But merely graphical or typographical devices, such as contractions, erratic presence of capitals, and (in seventeenth-century books) employment of italics to emphasize words, phrases, or whole passages, are not reproduced, and simple blunders, which would mislead the reader, are tacitly corrected. The recent use of italics, to indicate a doubt about the status of a word, is retained as being often of historical importance.

As to letters, the Old and Middle English 'thorn' (þ = th) and Old English 'divided d' or 'the' (ð, usually only a variant of 'þ', though sometimes distinguished, as in the KEY TO PRONUNCIATION) are retained; also ME. 'open-tailed g', or 'yea' (ȝ = y initially, gh finally) In Old English, the letter g had the form 'ȝ, g' (a peculiar British development of the Roman G) Besides the original sound in go, gild, this letter had also (at least in later Old English) a fricative sound as in German tag, or Irish lough (or both), and a palatalized sound, approximately = y in ye, yes After the Norman Conquest the modern forms 'g, g', were introduced (from French) for the sound in go, and the new sound in ginger, but the OE form (in process of time slightly modified) was retained for the sounds in lough, yes, till the introduction of Printing In printing Old English, modern scholars sometimes reproduce the contemporary 'ȝ, g' (as is done by Sievers, in his Angelsachsische Grammatik), but more commonly substitute modern 'g, g'. The adoption of either course exclusively in this work would have broken the historical continuity of the forms, in the one case, we should have had the same word appearing in the eleventh century as 'gold', and in the twelfth century as 'gold', in the other, the same word written in the eleventh century 'ge' and in twelfth century 'ȝe' To avoid this, both forms are here used in Old English, in accordance with the Middle English distinction in their use, thus, 'gold', 'ȝe', 'dæg'. The reader will understand that 'g' and 'ȝ' represent the same Old English letter, and that the distinction made between them is purely editorial (though certainly corresponding to a distinction of sound in OE) For ME the form 'ȝ' commonly used in reprints is employed, so that OE 'ȝe' becomes ME 'ȝe', modern 'ye', OE 'ȝenóg, ȝenóh', ME 'ynoȝ, inouȝ', mod 'enough'.

It is to be distinctly borne in mind that the quotations are not merely examples of the fully developed use of the word or special sense under which they are cited: they have also to illustrate its origin, its gradual separation from allied words or senses, or even, by negative evidence, its non-existence at the given date. It would often have been desirable to annotate the quotations, explaining the purpose for which they are adduced, but the exigencies of space render this impossible, and they are therefore left to speak for themselves. Some help has been offered by enclosing within [. . .] quotations given for what may be called subsidiary purposes.

The need to keep the Dictionary within practicable limits has also rendered it necessary to give only a minimum of quotations selected from the material available, and to make those given as brief as possible. It is to be observed that in their abridged form they simply illustrate the word, phrase, or construction, for which they are given, and do not necessarily express the sentiments of their authors, though in no case have they been intentionally curtailed in such a way as to misrepresent their original meaning. This, however, may always be ascertained, and the full context recovered, by help of the exact reference to author, work, and passage, which it is a special feature of this work to give. Here also the utmost conciseness has been indispensable; the exact date renders the surnames only of authors in most cases sufficient; the titles of books are so abbreviated as to be recognizable by those who know them, or to be adequate for the purpose of reference to a library or bibliographical catalogue. This is all that is now attempted; but a list, hereafter to be given, of all the authors and works quoted, with the editions read, and the Readers who extracted them for the Dictionary will give the full title of each work and form of abbreviation used, as well as indicate the mode of reference to each. Meanwhile, it may be stated that, in order to make the latter as simple as possible, an approximately uniform value has been given to different forms of numerals. Thus, in all works, Roman Capitals (IV) stand for volume, small capitals (iv.) for book, part, or other larger division; lower-case letters (iv) for chapter or its equivalent, and Arabic numerals (42) for page. Other divisions, as marginal section—the most useful of references, since it is not dependent on the paging of a particular edition—are indicated by special marks. In the Essayists of the 18th c. (Spectator, &c.), of which the editions are innumerable, the reference ¶ is to the paragraphs of each essay or number, counted for this purpose In Poetry, the reference iv. iv. 42 means act, scene, line; or canto, stanza, line, (rarely book, canto, stanza,) as the work may be divided In Shakspere (where the reading is that of the First Folio, 1623) the lines of the Globe edition are referred to. In dramatic works, or other long poems, of which the lines are not numbered, the Arabic numerals mean the page of the edition quoted. Single poems are, whenever possible, cited by name and line; in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, every edition of which has its own order and numbering, the only useful mode of reference was to number the lines of each piece, tale, or prologue, separately. As neither MSS. nor editions agree as to the junction of the Canon's Yeoman's Prologue and Tale, the two have been reckoned as one piece. Melibœus and the Parson's Tale are referred to by the versicles as divided in the Six-text edition, but numbered separately. In many works, both prose and verse, the only available reference has been to the volume and page of a specified edition, which is thus indicated, 'Wks. 1802, III 178'.

Wherever practicable, a work is dated and quoted from its first edition: if the reference is to a later edition (as has been often unavoidable), the date of this is added (within parentheses) to the reference *. It is necessary to be precise on this point; for later editions often change the spelling: hence a quotation from them is valid for the use of the word, but not for its spelling, at the date assigned. It is hoped that reasonable accuracy has been attained in dates and references: in the former, absolute accuracy is in many cases impossible, and, for the purposes of this work, not essential; in the latter, errors are inevitable in the work of so many years and so many readers.

* In the case of some well-known and often-quoted works, where the reference is always to a standard edition or modern literal reprint, it has not been thought necessary to insert the date of it. This omission occurs in the case of nearly all the publications printed by the Early English Text and other similar Societies, the reprints of Mr Arber, and the following among other works.—Ancren Riwle (ed. 1853), BELLENDENE Livy (ed. 1821), LD. BERNERS Froissart (ed. 1812), BURKE Works (ed. 1808), FABYAN Chronicle (ed. 1811), GOWER Confessio

SUBORDINATE WORDS.

Under this head are here included.—1. (and mainly) Obsolete and variant forms of words, when these are so far removed in spelling as not to come closely before or after the regular form, or readily to suggest it. These words are concisely referred to the Main Form to which they belong, with an explanatory synonym, when the latter is itself obsolete, as Almucantar, -urie, obs. ff. (i e. obsolete forms of) ALMACANTUR, Abugge, obs. w. and s.w. f. (= obsolete western and south-western form of) ABYE v., Almoise, -moyse, var. (= variant of) ALMOSE, Obs. alms. To economize space variant forms which differ from the regular form only in the doubling of a single consonant or the converse, as Apperi for APERT, Aple for APPLE, or in the interchange of u, v or i, j, are not usually inserted. 2. Irregular or Peculiar inflexions of Main Words. 3. Alleged words of bad or doubtful formation, or doubtful existence, and spurious or erroneous forms found in Dictionaries, or cited from single passages in authors, but having little or no claim to recognition as genuine constituents of the English vocabulary: their character is pointed out, and their history briefly given.

COMBINATIONS.

Under this term are included all collocations of simple words in which the separate spelling of each word is retained, whether they are formally connected by the hyphen, or virtually by the unity of their signification. The formal union and the actual by no means coincide, not only is the use of the hyphen a matter of indifference in an immense number of cases, but in many where it is habitually used, the combination implies no unity of signification; while others, in which there is a distinct unity or specialization of meaning, are not hyphened. The primary use of the hyphen is grammatical: it implies either that the syntactic relation between two words is closer than if they stood side by side without it, or that the relation is a less usual one than that which would at first sight suggest itself to us, if we saw the two words standing unconnected. Thus, in the three sentences, 'After consideration had been given to the proposal, it was duly accepted,' 'After consideration the proposal was accepted,' 'After-consideration had shown him his mistake,' we have first no immediate syntactic relation between after (conjunctive adverb) and consideration, secondly, the relation of preposition and object; thirdly, the relation of attribute and substantive, closer than the first, less usual than the second (since after is more commonly a preposition than an adjective) But after-consideration is not really a single word, any more than subsequent consideration, fuller consideration, the hyphen being merely a convenient help to the sense, which would be clearly expressed in speech by the different phrase-accentuation of a'fter considera''tion and a''fter considera tion. And as this 'help to the sense' is not always equally necessary, nor its need equally appreciated in the same place, it is impossible that its use should be uniform Nevertheless after-consideration, as used above, is on the way to become a single word, which reconsideration (chiefly because re- is not a separate word, but also because we have reconsider) is reckoned to be; and indeed close grammatical relation constantly accompanies close union of sense, so that in many combinations the hyphen becomes an expression of this unification of sense. When this unification and specialization has proceeded so far that we no longer analyze the combination into its elements, but take it in as a whole, as in blackberry, postman, newspaper, pronouncing it in speech with a single accent, the hyphen is usually omitted, and the fully developed compound is written as a single word But as this also is a question of degree, there are necessarily many compounds as to which usage has not yet determined whether they are to be written with the hyphen or as single words. Many specialized combinations, indeed, are often not even hyphened: especially is this the case with descriptive names, formed of a substantive preceded by an adjective or possessive case, or followed by a phrase, as Aaron's Rod, All fours, Blue John, Jack by the hedge, Jack in a box, Jew's harp, Sea Anemone, Sea Horse.

There is thus considerable difficulty in determining to what extent combinations are matters for the lexicographer, and to what extent they are merely grammatical. While no attempt is made fully to solve this difficulty, combinations formal and virtual are, for practical purposes, divided into three classes: First, those in which each word retains its full meaning, the relation between them falling under one or other of the ordinary grammatical categories. Of these, specimens merely are given, at the end of each Article, which are printed in italics, and illustrated collectively by a few quotations. Second: Combinations of which the signification is somewhat specialized, but still capable of being briefly explained in a few words, in connexion with their cognates These also are concisely treated at the end of the Main Article, where they are printed in small Clarendon type in an alphabetical series, and illustrated by quotations arranged in the same order. When these are very numerous the word illustrated is distinguished in the quotation by prefixing *, in order that it may catch the eye more readily. Third: Combinations which attain in specialization of sense to the position of full compounds or which are used in various senses, or have a long history, and thus require to be dealt with more at large. These are enumerated (in SMALL CAPITALS) at the end of the Main Article, and thence referred to their alphabetical place, where they are treated in all respects as Main Words.

Amantis (ed. 1857), HALL Chronicle (ed. 1809), HOLINSHED Chronicle (ed. 1587), HOLLAND Pliny (ed. 1634), JOHNSON Works (ed 1787), LUTTRELL Brief Relation (ed. 1857), MAUNDEVILE Travels (ed 1839), SIR T. MORE Works (ed 1557), PALSGRAVE Eclaircissement de la Langue Française (ed 1852), PECOCK Repressor (ed. 1860), RALEIGH History of the World (ed 1736), ROBERT OF BRUNNE Chronicle (ed. 1825), ROBERT OF GLOUCESTER Chronicle (ed 1824), SHAFTESBURY Characteristics (ed. 1737), SHOREHAM Poems (ed. 1849), ADAM SMITH Wealth of Nations (ed 1869), SOUTHEY Works (ed. 1853), STANLEY History of Philosophy (ed. 1701), STEWART Chronicle of Scotland (ed. 1856), TOPSELL History of Four-footed Beasts (ed. 1673), History of Serpents (ed. 1653), TREVISA Higden's Polychronicon (Rolls Series)

All Compounds and Combinations of interest or importance will thus be found either in their alphabetical order, or under the word which constitutes their first element. But phrases are treated under their leading word, as on account of, under ACCOUNT; and specific names, like Sea Anemone, Black Alder, under their generic names ANEMONE, ALDER, etc. Sea Anemone is considered (linguistically) as a kind of Anemone, but Adam's Needle not as a kind of Needle, nor Mouse-ear as a kind of Ear.

PRONUNCIATION.

The pronunciation is the actual living form or forms of a word, that is, the word itself, of which the current spelling is only a symbolization—generally, indeed, only the traditionally-preserved symbolization of an earlier form, sometimes imperfect to begin with, still oftener corrupted in its passage to our time. This living form is the latest fact in the form-history of the word, the starting-point of all investigations into its previous history, the only fact in its form-history to which the lexicographer can personally witness. For all his statements as to its previous history are only reproductions of the evidence of former witnesses, or deductions drawn from earlier modes of symbolizing the forms of the word then current, checked and regulated by the ascertained laws and principles of phonology. To register the current pronunciation is therefore essential, in a dictionary which deals with the language on historical principles. It would be manifestly absurd, for example, to trace the form-history of the first numeral from the Old Teutonic ain, through the Old English án, to the Middle English oan, on, oon, one, and to stop short at the last of these, without recognizing the modern English wʌn, which represents a greater change within the last three and a half centuries than had previously taken place in 1500 years. The fact that the written history, as embodied in the spelling, accidentally stops short at the Middle English one, makes it all the more necessary to give the modern history and current form of the living word, since of these no hint is otherwise conveyed.

But the living word is sound cognizable by the ear, and must therefore be itself symbolized in order to reach the understanding through the eye. The most that can be done is to provide a careful and consistent means of representing it, in which the symbols should agree with the actual values of letters used either in the earlier or later stages of the language. For historical purposes the earlier values of letters are the more convenient; and accordingly, the symbols here adopted are the Roman letters, in most cases retaining the values which they had when first employed to write English, to these are added such modifications and amplifications as are required by the phonetic changes and discriminations which distinguish a modern from an ancient language. The reference of the symbols to a permanent standard, such as the Visible Speech of Mr. A. Melville Bell, will be made elsewhere: in the following table they are merely illustrated by words which exemplify the sounds.

As a general principle, each simple sound is represented by a single symbol. In choosing additional symbols, regard has been had to former usage or analogy; thus 'æ' was the Old English symbol for a in at, 'ǫ' the Icelandic for o in not, ɔ (reversed e) is used for a sound most commonly written e, as in err, ɛvɛɪ; ɒ (reversed a) for a sound expressed by a in Sanskrit and Oriental languages, as in Chandɒ'nagar or Chundɒ'nugger. In the consonants, ɹ (reversed r) is used for the vocalized retracted r in her, 'þ' and 'ð' are taken from Old English, with their powers discriminated, ʃ (sh), ʒ (zh), and ŋ (ng) from the Phonotypy of Messrs. Pitman and Ellis.

In the Vowels, ordinary (or short) quantity is unmarked; long quantity is marked by (¯); medial quantity, when distinguished, by (ˈ); obscure quality by (˘). In modern English speech, vowels are regularly obscured in syllables that have neither primary nor subordinate stress, especially in those that follow the main stress; they then approach, or fall into, the sound of the mid-mixed vowel or ə. But, in syllabic or rhetorical pronunciation, or in singing, the original vowels are more or less heard, by writing these with the mark of obscuration, we are enabled to indicate at once the theoretical and the actual pronunciation. The vowel in pass, command, variously identified by different speakers with a in man, and ɑ in father, is symbolized by the avowedly ambiguous ɑ. Similarly, the doubtful length of the o in off, soft, lost (by some made short as in got, by some long as in Corfe, by others medial), is indicated by ɔ̄. In cases where sounds are identified by some English speakers, and distinguished by others, it has been thought best to mark the distinction, which may be disregarded by those to whom it is unknown; thus, the sounds in fɜr and fʉr are discriminated by the majority of orthoepists, though commonly identified by natives of the south of England, to whom our fɜ̄ɹ and fʉ̄ɹ will thus indicate the same sound. So ǫ and ɒ, in watch, Scotch, are identified by many.

The generally recognized Diphthongs in by, boy, bow, few, pure, are expressed by ɔɪ, oɪ, ɑʊ, ɪʊ̄, ɪū, and the diphthong in ay (yes) by aɪ (when distinguished from that in eye, əɪ). After r, the simple ʉ, u, take the place of ɪʊ̄, ɪū, which is also the usage of many speakers after l, as in lʉte, lʉnar, lʉre, where others make, or try to make, a diphthong. This doubtful diphthong we write ˈʊ̄, ˈū, as lˈʊ̄, lˈūɹ. The half-sized ˈ, ᵘ, are also used to express the second element in the imperfect or doubtful diphthongs in fate, note (fēˈt, nōᵘt), which many orthoepists treat only as long ē, ō, the half-sized ᵒ is similarly used to express the non-recognized vowel-element developed between ī, ē, ō, ū, and ɹ or r, as in pɹeɹ, pɑɹe, poɹe, pooɹ, weary (pīᵊɹ, wīᵊrɪ).

Syllables are not divided; but, when two vowels come together and do not make a diphthong, they are separated by the break (ˌ), which in this case divides two syllables. The break is not written between the two vowels in groups such as -ɹal, -ɹan, in pɹctoɹ-ɹal, Iɛn-ɹan, which are pronounced either in two syllables, or (familiarly) in one. It is written between t and ʃ, d and ʒ, in compounds like knightshɪp (naɪtˌʃɪp), where the two consonants do not form a consonantal diphthong, as tʃ and dʒ ordinarily do, as in pɪtcher, lǫdʒɪŋ (pɪ tʃəɹ, lǫ·dʒɪŋ). Also in words like antacid, antambulacɹal (æ ntˌæ sɪd, ɑ ntˌæmbɪʉlēˈkrăl) where the first syllable is ant-, not an-. And it is used in combinations and long words with two accents, to separate the two accentual groups into which the word naturally falls, as in plano-convex, agamogenesɪs (plēˈ noˌkǫ nvɛks, æ gămoˌdʒɛ·nɪ̆sɪs).

The main Stress or Syllabic Accent is indicated by a 'turned period' (·) after the vowel, whether long or short (not after the consonant at the end of the syllable); subordinate stress is marked (ˌ), only where it attains to the strength of secondary accent, in long words and compounds, as cry stallɪza·tion, a·fter-wɪ tted, the ordinary subordinate stress, as in the first syllable of telesco pic, antece·dent, which is not more than tertiary, is not marked, being sufficiently indicated by the clearness of the vowel (telɪ̆skǫ pɪk, æntɪ̆sē dĕnt). In loose combinations, of which both elements have a main accent, the stronger stress is occasionally indicated by (ˈ) as in a· fter-cou nsel.

ENGLISH DICTIONARY

ON A HISTORICAL BASIS.

A (ēɪ), the first letter of the Roman Alphabet, and of its various subsequent modifications (as were its prototypes Alpha of the Greek, and Aleph of the Phœnician and old Hebrew), representing originally in English, as in Latin, the 'low-back-wide' vowel, formed with the widest opening of jaws, pharynx, and lips The plural has been written aes, A's, As

c 1340 HAMPOLE Pr Consc 481 And by þat cry men knaw þan Whether it be man or weman, For when it es born it cryes swa If it be man it says a! a! That þe first letter is of þe nam Of our forme-fader Adam c 1386 CHAUCER Prol 161 On which was first i-write a crowned A, And after, Amor vincit omnia 1401 Pol Poems II 57 I know not an a [Ā] from the wynd-mylne, ne a b [B] from a bole-foot 1678 BUTLER Hudib III i 1006 And loue your Loues with A's and B's 1765 TUCKER Light of Nat II 89 Tully tells us, a hog has been known to make a perfect letter A with his snout upon the ground, but nobody ever saw, or thought it possible to see, the whole poem of Ennius scratched out in that manner and I believe he might have added safely, that no man ever saw a single A written by a hog, without a multitude of other irregular scratches round about it a 1842 TENNYSON The Epic 50 Mouthing out his hollow oes and aes, Deep-chested music

Forms of A, and Sounds historically represented by it see INTRODUCTION The sounds now represented by A are thus symbolized in this work —

(1) ēɪ in name, nēɪm	(4) ā in father, fā ðəɹ.
(2) ē „ bare, bēəɹ	(5) ǭ „ water, wǭ təɹ
(3) æ „ man, mæn	(6) ǫ „ want, wǫnt.

The vowel in chant, past, varies with different speakers from 3 to 4, with various intermediate sounds, and is here, with intentional ambiguity, indicated by

(7) ɑ as tʃant, pɑst (without determining the quantity or quality)

In unaccented syllables these vowels are modified, and obscured, thus —

(8) e (ɪ)	in village, marriage,	vɪ ledʒ, mæ rɪdʒ
(9) eɪ (e)	„ separate, v	se părɛɪt (-ĕt, -ɛt).
(10) ĕ (ĕ)	„ separate, adj	se părĕt (-ɛt)
(11) ĕ	„ antarctic,	ĕntā ɹktɪk
(12) ă	„ lunar, amœba,	lū năɹ, ămī bă
(13) ŏ	„ authority,	ŏþǫ ɹĭtɪ

1 and 2 are also commonly represented by the digraphs ai, ay, as in pain, pay, pair (pēɪn, pēɪ, pēəɹ), and 5 by au, aw, as in laud, law (lǭd, lǭ) Az, ay rarely represent a diphthong (aɪ), as in ay, Isaɑah (aɪ, əɪzaɪ ă, also əɪ, əɪzēɪ ă), au is a diphthong (ɑu) only in foreign words

Except in syllabic, or strictly rhetorical utterance, 10, 11, 12 are practically = ə (e in water, wǭ təɹ), and 13 = ŏ (as in collect, kŏle kt), sinking colloquially to ə (ǫþǫ ɹĭtɪ, ŏþǫ ɹĭtɪ, əþǫ ɹĭtɪ), to which also 9 (but not 8) falls in careless speech. In rapid utterance this ə may become a mere voice glide (ʾ), or entirely disappear, as separate adj se părĕt, se pərət, se p'rət, se prət These phonetic variations in actual speech are reflected in variant spellings like mackarel, mackerel, mackrel; abanet, abnet, caravel, carvel, Catharine, Catherine, Cathrine; dependant, dependent, and common 'mistakes' in spelling, such as seperate.

II The letters of the alphabet, or some of them, are also used to indicate serial order and distinguish things in a series, as the notes of the musical scale, the 'quires' or sheets of a book, classes of ships, propositions in logic, quantities in algebra, points, and hence lines and figures in geometry. As the order is in some cases fixed, A or a has some specialized uses

1 In Music The 6th note of the diatonic scale of C major, or the first note of the relative minor scale of C, corresponding to la in the Tonic Sol-fa notation Also, the scale of a composition with A as its key-note, as 'a symphony in A'

1609 DOULAND Ornithoparcus Micrologus 22 In the first part set A Base, in the third D sol re, in the fifth A lamire 1806 CALLCOTT Gramm of Music The notes of Music are named from the first seven letters of the alphabet, A, B, C, D, E, F, G When the Melody, or Tune, exceeds these seven, the same series of letters must be repeated 1880 GROVE Duct Mus I 192 The beautiful and passionate Sonata in A which was inspired by and dedicated to his [Beethoven's] friend Madame Ertmann

2 In Nautical language see A 1 below.

3 In Logic a universal affirmative.

1866 MANSEL (in Bowen Logic 201) A is declared by Aristotle to be the most difficult proposition to establish, and the easiest to overthrow

4 In Abstract reasoning, hypothetical argumentation, Law, etc A means any one thing or person, B another, C a third, etc ; as, A becomes surety to B for C, C fails in his engagements, on which B, etc

1870 BOWEN Logic III 49 Every conceivable thing is either A or not-A Of course A and not A, taken together, include the universe

5 In Algebra a, b, c, and other early letters of the alphabet are used to express known quantities, as x, y, z are to express the unknown

III Abbreviations A., a, a, stands for

1 anno, in the year, as A D anno domini, in the year of our Lord, A.M anno mundi, in the year of the world, A U C anno urbis conditæ, in the year of the city (Rome) having been founded 2 ante, as 'a m' ante meridiem, before noon; a. 1600 or a 1600, before 1600 3 adjective, active (verb) 4 artium, as A B artium baccalaureus, A M artium magister, which in England are now written B A., M A, Bachelor, and Master, of Arts 5 alto 6 accepted (of bills) 7 Associate, as A L S Associate of the Linnæan Society 8. R A Royal Artillery, Royal Academy or Academician; F.S A Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, F.R A.S Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society, and many similar titles 9 A B able-bodied seaman. 10 a or aa in Med ANA, q.v

IV Phrases, 1. A per se, the letter A when standing by itself, especially when making a word

The word a was formerly spelt 'a-per-se, a,' that is, 'a by itself makes the word a,' whence also the letter itself was sometimes called A-per-se-A So also I per se, O per se, ŏ-per-se (and-per-se, an-per-se, ampersee)

Hence b fig (also formerly Apersie, Apersey, A per O) the first, chief, most excellent, most distinguished, or unique person or thing, one who is facile princeps, or in modern phrase, A 1

1475 HENRYSON Test of Cresseide 78 (Speght's Chaucer) The floure and A per se of Troie and Grece. a 1500 MS Cantab. Ff II 38 f 51 Thow schalt be an apersey, my sone, In mylys 15, or thre 1501 DUNBAR Poems, Suppli (1865) 277 London, thowe arte of townes A per se 1567 DRANT Horace Epist II 1 If they make them A per se Aes that none are like to them 1578 Gude and Godlie Ballates 128 Christ Jesus is ane A per C, And peirlesse Prince of all mercy 1602 MIDDLETON Blurt III. iii Who that is the a-per-se of all, the very cream of all

2 A1 Applied in Lloyd's Register to ships in first-class condition, as to hull and stores alike. 'The character A denotes New ships, or Ships Renewed or Restored. The Stores of Vessels are designated by the figures 1 and 2; 1 signifying that the Vessel is well and sufficiently found'—Key to the Register Added to the names of ships, as 'the fast-sailing ship "Sea-breeze," A 1 at Lloyd's,' or used attributively, 'the splendid A 1 clipper-built ship "Miranda"'

Hence, fig (familiar and savouring of commercial phraseology), A 1, or in U S A No 1, is used adjectively for 'prime, first-class'

1837 DICKENS Pickwick 341 (1847) 'He must be a first-rater,' said Sam. 'A 1,' replied Mr Roker 1851 MRS STOWE Dred I 313 An A number one cook, and no mistake 1861 COL. G WOLSELEY (Reynolds' Newsp Nov 24) The Chinese police are certainly A 1 at such work.

† A, adj 1 definite numeral Obs or dial Apocopate form of an, ane, used only before a consonant. [OE ān, one, of which the n began to disappear before a cons about 1150 In the definite numeral sense, ān and ā, following the ordinary course of OE. long ā, became in the south bef 1300, on (oon, one), o (oo), and eventually o became obs, leaving one as the form in all positions, while an and a, pronounced lightly and indistinctly, became the 'indefinite article' See next word But in the north an (or ane) and a were written in both senses, the stress or emphasis alone distinguishing the numeral from the article] See AN(E, O a, and ONE

c 1200 Trin. Coll Hom 39 Ure drihten drof fele deules togedere ut of á man, þe was of his wit c 1300 K Alis 5955 An eighe he had in his vys, And a foot, and no moo Iwys. c 1350 HAMPOLE Prose Tr 32 Some ere of a tre and some er of anoþer. 1483 CAXTON, Geoffroi de la Tour, lf. iiii b, They satte att dyner in a hall and the quene in another

A in the various forms a, ae, eae, eea, yea, yà, is still the regular form of the numeral one when used adjectively, in the northern dialects, the absolute form being an, ane, ean, yen, yàn, etc.

A (toneless ă, ə ; emph ēɪ), adj 2, called 'indefinite article' Before a vowel-sound an (ăn, emph æn). [A weakening of OE ān, 'one,' already by 1150 reduced before a cons to a About the same time the numeral began to be used in a weakened sense (usually unexpressed in OE as he wæs gód man, 'he was a good man', cf Chron 1137 'he wæs god munec & god man,' and 1140 'he wæs an yuel man'), becoming in this sense proclitic and toneless, ăn, ă, while as a numeral it remained long, ān, ā, and passed regularly during the next cent. into ōn, ō; see the piec word Though an began to sink to a in midl dial by 1150, it often remained bef. a cons to 1300, bef sounded h, an was retained after 1600, and somet after 1700, as an house, an heifer, an hermitage The present rule is to use an bef a vowel-sound (incl h mute, as an hour), a bef. a consonant-sound (including h sounded, and eu-, u- with sound of yū-, as a host, a one, a eunuch, a unit). But in unaccented syllables, many, perhaps most, writers still retain an bef sounded h, some even bef eu, u, as an historian, an euphonic vowel, an united appeal, though this is all but obsolete in speech, and in writing a becomes increasingly common in this position A, an has been indeclinable in midl and north dial since 1150, but vestiges of the OE declension (as nom f ane, gen m anes, gen & dat f are, acc m anne) remained much later in southern In north an was frequently written ane (with e mute), the use of a and an (e being as elsewhere, but about 1475 Scottish writers began to use ane in all positions, a practice which prevailed till the disuse of literary Scotch after 1600. A is strictly adjective and can only be used with a substantive following Meanings —

1 One, some, any. the oneness, or indefiniteness, being implied rather than asserted It is especially used in first introducing an object to notice, which object, after being introduced by a, is kept in view by the; as 'I plucked a flower; this is the flower' Used before a noun singular, and its attributes a Ordinarily before the name of an individual object or notion, or of a substance, quality or state individualized, and before a collective noun, as a tree, a wish, an ice, a beauty, a new ink, a greater strength, a second youth, a legion, a hundred, a pair

†A, a- (ă, ə) particle, prefixed to the pa pple and occasionally to other parts of the verb, = earlier ȝe- [Ger ge-, Goth ga-, together, altogether, completely], which in OE was sparingly used as a prefix to the pple (more commonly making a compound verb), but in 2–4 became, as ȝe-, y-, i-, the regular sign of the pa pple. in the south, as y-come, i-don, i-sen, y-ben, i-ben, i-be, etc The toneless i- afterwards sank into ă- (ə), as it is still pronounced in the south-western dialects, and was frequently written a distinct, or a- joined, in 14–16th c As many verbs had also a derivative form in a- in OE (as wake awake, rise arise), and many others were formed after them in ME, it is not always easy to say whether a pa pple in a- is to be referred to the simple verb, or to a derivative verb in a-, of which no other part is known So in mod G ge-standen may be pa pple of stehen, or of ge-stehen See I-, Y-.

A-, prefix, from various sources

1 OE. a-, originally ar- (rarely preserved, as in ar-æfnan), OHG. ar-, ir-ur- (mod G er-), Goth. us- ur-, implying motion onward or away from a position, hence away, on, up, out, and thus with verbs of motion adding intensity, as in a-bide, a-go, a-rise, a-wake, and many obs verbs, after the analogy of which it was subsequently prefixed to other vbs, not found with it in OE, as a-curse In some words this a- has been formally confused with OFr a-:—L ad-, ac-, af-, etc (No 7), and, like this, refashioned after assumed L. analogies, as in a(c)-curse, for a-curse, a(l)-lay for a-lay, a(f)-fright for a-fright, etc

2 ME a-.—OE an, on, prep See A prep 1 above With nouns, in, on, engaged in, at, in loose combinations, which are really two words; as abed, ashore, afield, asleep, alive With verbs, adverbs, and prepositions, more closely combined both in form and sense, as aknow, ashame, afore, among, across

3 ME a-.—OE of prep (see A prep 2) meaning off, from, in a-down, a-thirst, of, in akin, anew, afresh, a-clock

4 ME a-.—OE and- against, opposite, as in a-long

5 ME a- for AT, Norse at prep 'to,' used in the north as sign of the infinitive = to In ado, early northern Eng at do See also A-DOORS

6 ME a- for i-, y- –ȝe-, as in a(f)-ford, along = owing to, and in southern pa pples as a-done, etc See A particle above

7 ME a-=Fr pref a- —L. ad-, to, at, hence sometimes expressing addition or increase, sometimes bringing into a state, as in abandon, abase, abate, abut, achieve, adroit, agree, alarm, amass, amaze, ameliorate, amerce, amount, amuse, apropos, avail, avenge, avenue, aver, avouch, avow In 14th cent. a practice arose among French scribes of refashioning words originally having this prefix, after L. ad- and its phonetic variants ac-, af-, ag-, al-, an-, ap-, ar-, as-, at-; this extended in 15th c to Eng, where the great majority of words from OFr were so treated, so as to simulate a direct formation from L. Cf. a(d)dress, a(c)count, a(f)fect, a(g)grieve, a(l)lege, a(n)noy, a(p)pear, a(c)quit, a(r)rive, a(s)sent, a(t)tain, a(d)venture, a(d)vertise, a(d)vise, a(d)vocate, a(d)vowson, where etymological spelling would have simple a- It was even extended to words not derived from L ad-, as a(d)vance, Fr avancer, L ab-anteāre, a(c)knowledge, OE on-+knowledge, a(c)curse, OE a-+curse

8 ME a-=Fr a-.—L ab off, away, from; as in a-bridge (ab-breviāre), a-steyne, a-soil Sometimes afterwards refashioned, as ab-stain, or confused with the prec and erroneously respelt, as as-soil

9. ME a-=Anglo-Fr a- for OFr e-, es- —L ex- out, utterly; as in a-mend (L emendare) abash (OFr esbahiss-), afforce (esforcer), affray (esfrei), and many forms, now obs or refashioned, as a-may, as-aumple, as-cape, a-move, or where the a- has been lost by aphesis, as scapement, sample, spenser, or has been confused with No 10 and refashioned with en-, as ex-emplum, es-emple, a-saumple, ansample, en-sample, or with ad- as admerveille

10 ME. a- —earlier Eng and Anglo-Fr an-, OFr en- This Anglo-Fr an- was formally confused with OE an- (see No 2), and like it reduced bef a cons to a-, as in abushment, acloy, acumber, alumine, apeach, apair, apoison In most cases these words are now obs or refashioned, as ambushment, encumber, enluminе, impeach; or have been aphetized, as peach, cloy, limn; or have been further confused with words in a- —L ad- (No. 7), and erroneously respelt accordingly, as accloy, accumber, allumine, appair, appeach

11. Many words with a- in one or other of the preceding senses have aphetic forms with the a- lost, as adown down, amid mid, alive live, amend mend, abate bate In others the force of the prefix is so little apparent, that the derivatives in a- hardly differ in sense from their primitives, as in rise arise, wake awake, grieve a(g)grieve, cumber acumber, done adone Hence, it naturally happened that all these a- prefixes were at length confusedly lumped together in idea, and the resultant a- looked upon as vaguely intensive, rhetorical, euphonic, or even archaic, and wholly otiose With this vague feeling, a- was often prefixed by Spenser and other artificial archaists of the 16th cent. to words both of OE and Romance origin, where it had no historical or etymological basis and can only be explained as due to vague form-association. This also was often treated like a-:—L ad (No 7), and spelt ad-, ac-, af-, ag-, etc accordingly.

12 a-, from L a=ad prefix and preposition, to; reduced in late Latin to a- before sc-, sp-, st-, as in a-scend, a-spirate, a-scribe, a-spect, a-spersion, a-spire, a-sprate, a-strict, a-stringent See AD-

13 a-, from L. a=ab, prefix and preposition from, off, away; only before v, as in avert See AB-

14 a-, from Gr. ἀ-, used bef a cons for ἀν-, pref of privation or negation = without, not, -less, in words introd into Eng through L and Fr as abysm, adamant, amethyst, or through L as acatalectic, adiaphorous, apetalous, or from Gr direct (or through a mod lang) as amorphous, adipsy, or formed on Gr elements, as abiogenetic, agnostic In the latter case, a- has become a living prefix of negation = un-, non-, applied not only to words from Gr, as a-cotyledonous, a-chromatic, a-philanthropy, but also to technical words from L, as a-caulous, a-sexual.

15. a-, from Gr ἀ- intensive, as in a-bolla, a-maurosis, a-tlas

Ablatitious (æblăti ʃəs), a. [f. L. ablāt-us taken away, removed (see ABLATE) + -ITIOUS, L. -īcius; cf. addut-itious.] Having the quality or character of a withdrawal or deduction. Ablatitious force (in Astr.) that which diminishes the gravitation of a satellite towards its planet, esp. of the moon towards the earth.

The moon being sometimes nearer to, and sometimes farther from, the sun than the earth, the attraction of the sun on the moon will sometimes be greater, and sometimes less, than his attraction on the earth. The difference estimated along the tangent to the moon's orbit and along the radius drawn from her position to the earth is called the tangential and central disturbing force respectively. The central disturbing force is ablatitious when it lessens the gravitation of the moon towards the earth. It is ablatitious in syzygies and additious in quadratures.

1833 SIR J. HERSCHEL Astron. xi. 352 This . . is termed the ablatitious force, because it tends to diminish the gravity. Ibid. 365 The average effect . . gives the preponderance to the ablatitious or enfeebling power.

Ablative (æ blătɪv), a. and sb. [a. Fr. ablatif, -ve, ad. L. ablātīv-us, lit. of or pertaining to removal from, f. ablāt- ppl. stem of auferre to carry away (see ABLATE and -IVE); applied by Cæsar to a case of the noun found in L. but not in Gr. In Latin only used in the grammatical sense.]

1. Name of one of the cases of the noun in Latin and some other Aryan languages, the proper function of which was to express direction from a place, or time. In Latin it was extended to the source whence an action proceeds, the cause or ideal source of an event, the instrument and agent or material sources of an action, the manner in which, and sometimes the place and time at which anything is done. Often used substantively, case being understood.

The ablative was one of the original Aryan cases. In Greek, Teutonic, and Slavonic, it was lost or formally confounded with other cases, but it survived in Latin, where it had absorbed the Instrumental, and in part the Locative of earlier Aryan (whence its extension in L. to other than ablative senses). The case, not occurring in Greek, was without a name, till the appropriate one of Cāsus Ablātīvus was given to it, from its primary function, by Julius Caesar. Since the rise of Comparative Philology the name has been applied to the same case wherever found existing, as well as to the relation properly expressed by it, however this may be formally shown.

Ablative Absolute, in Latin Grammar, an ablative case of a noun with a participle in concord, expressing the time, occasion, or circumstance of a fact stated, as sole oriente, tenebrae aufugunt, at, upon, or through the sun rising, darkness flees away.

Lang.* 100 We learn from a fragment of Cæsar's work, De Analogia, that he was the inventor of the term ablative in Latin. 1879 WHITNEY Sanscrit Gr. § 289 The ablative is the 'from'-case, in the various senses of that preposition. it is used to express removal, separation, distinction, issue, and the like.

The initial silent h has been generally dropped in Eng. from the first, though many classical scholars tried to restore it in 6-7. In 5 the Fr. hable, able was refashioned after L. as abille, habil, habile, and spellings imitating either these or L. habil-em occur in Eng. and Sc. writers in 6-7, of which habile has come down to the present day, as a differentiated form, able leaning in mod. use to the sense of power, habile to that of skill. Of the derivatives ability has lost the h, but habilitate, habilitation, habiliment retain it, through being narrowed down to senses which connect themselves with mod. Fr. habit, habiller. -able, a. Fr -able:—L -ābilem, adj suffix, the special form taken by the suffix -bili- (see -BLE) when added to vbs in -āre, Fr -er Extended in Fr to vbs of all conjugations, -ble taking the place of -nt in pr pple, thus périss-able, recev-able, vend-able, défend-able, mouv-able. Originally found in Eng only in words from OFr. but soon by analysis of such instances as pass-able, agree-able, amend-able, treated as a living suffix, and freely employed to form analogous adjectives, not only on vbs from Fr, but at length on native words, as bearable, speakable, breakable, wearable This extension seems to be largely due to form-association with the adj. ABLE (to which the suffix is not related), so that catable, e g is taken as eat + able, able to be eaten. The vb has often a sb of the same form, as in debat-able, rat(e)-able, these lead the way to such as carriageable, clubbable, where the sb seems to be the source, and saleable, in which no vb exists Recent usage adds -able even to a verbal phrase as get-a t-able, come-a t-able Now always with passive sense, but in early words often active, as in comfortable, suitable, able to comfort, suit

¶ If a representative of Gael abdhaine, abthaine, med L abthania, is retained as a special term for 'the territory of those churches called Monasteria, which were founded by the Columban clergy' in ancient Celtic Scotland, the best form would be Abthany, as distinct from the equivocal Abthane and his supposed jurisdiction Abthanry or Abthanage.

Accent (a ksĕnt), sb [a Fr accent, OFr acent — L accent-um f ad to + cantus singing, a literal rendering of Gr προσῳδία, f πρός to + ᾠδή song, lit 'song added to' sc speech see note under sense 1] 1 A prominence given to one syllable in a word, or in a phrase, over the adjacent syllables, independently of the mode in which this prominence is produced

Accent in Gr (προσῳδία) is explained by Dion Hal περὶ συνθεσεως ὀνοματων ch xi as a distinct difference of musical pitch in pronouncing the syllables of a word, those having the grave or heavy accent (βαρεῖα gravis) being spoken at a comparatively low pitch, those having the acute or sharp accent (ὀξεῖα acūtus) being spoken as nearly as possible a musical Fifth higher (δια πεντε), and those having the circumflex accent (περισπωμενη circumflexus) beginning in the high pitch and descending a Fifth during the pronunciation of the same syllable The same three varieties occurred in Latin, but their positions in a word followed very different laws This variety of pitch disappeared for both Latin and Greek towards the end of the Third Century A D when the feeling of quantity was lost, and the high pitch in Greek and Latin became merely greater force, and this stress accent has remained the substitute for musical accent in modern Greek, in Italian and Spanish, and is also found in German and English In Swedish and Norwegian a musical syllabic accent remains in use, in Danish it is replaced in some circumstances by a peculiar catch, and in others by stress, as in English In French, where probably stress was at one time strongly marked, the difference for at least three centuries has been so slight that writers have disputed as to its nature and the position of the stress syllable In all languages having the stress, a variable alteration of pitch and quality of tone always prevails, and is used to express varieties of feeling This expression belongs to rhetoric The grammatical varieties of accent in English are great, but are all varieties of stress The position is fixed in words of more than one syllable. Monosyllables have various degrees of stress according to circumstances Hence the distinction of syllabic accent for the first, and verbal accent, phrase accent, or emphasis for the second (A J Ellis)

1581 Sidney Def. Poesie (1622) 529 Though we doe not obserue quantitie, yet we obserue the accent very precisely 1589 Puttenham Eng. Poesie (1811) II vi 65 To that which was highest lift vp and most eleuate or shrillest in the eare, they gaue the name of the sharpe accent, to the lowest and most base because it seemed to fall downe rather than to rise vp, they gaue the name of the heauy accent, and that other which seemed in part to lift vp and in part to fall downe, they called the circumflex, or compast accent: and if new termes were not odious, we might very properly call him the (windabout) for so is the Greek word a 1637 B Jonson Eng. Gramm (1696) All our vowels are sounded doubtfully In quantity (which is time) long or short Or, in accent (which is tune) sharp or flat 1748 J Mason Elocution 26 When we distinguish any particular syllable in a word with a strong Voice, it is called Accent, and when we thus distinguish any particular Word in a Sentence it is called Emphasis 1871 Earll Philol Eng Tongue xii 525 Accent is the elevation of the voice which distinguishes one part of a word from another.

2 a The marks by which the nature and position of the spoken accent were indicated in a word

The old Latin forms (′) acūtus, (`) gravis, (^) circumflexus, are retained, but each one now represents mere stress, except in works on elocution where (′) now generally represents a rising (not a fixed high) pitch, (`) a falling pitch (the ancient circumflex), and (^) a rising followed by a falling pitch, not used in ancient Latin and Greek Some writers use (^) for length only, the same as (¯) The old meanings are quite lost (A J E)

b Marks used to distinguish the different qualities of sound indicated by a letter, called diacritical accents

The old ′ ` ^ are mostly used, as French éèêë in je, été, tiède, même, but a great variety of other signs have also been introduced These diacritical accents sometimes distinguish meaning only, as French a à, la là These marks are not used in English orthography But sometimes ` is used to shew that -ed is to be pronounced as a distinct syllable, as learned, hallowed, and some write é for a final e pronounced, as Halle (properly German Halle) (A. J E)

1596 Spenser State of Irel 30 Being likewise distinguished with pricke and accent, as theirs aunciently 1611 Florio, Accento. an accent or point ouer anie letter to giue it a due sound 1611 Cotgr., Accent aigu: a sharp accent marked thus ′, and much used Accentuer to marke, note, or pronounce, with an Accent c 1620 Huml Orthogr. Brit Tongue (1865) 22 The grave accent is never noated, but onelie understood in al syllabes quherin the acute and circumflex is not 1807 Robinson Archæol Græca v xiii. 470 The ancient Greeks used no accents, which are supposed to have been invented and introduced about two hundred years before Jesus Christ After the Greek language became the favourite study of foreigners, it was necessary to facilitate the pronunciation of it by applying marks of accent for that purpose and this, very probably, induced Aristophanes of Byzantium to invent and introduce those accentual virgulae

c Marks of various kinds placed over and under the consonants in Hebrew, serving as signs of tone and of interpunctuation, hence fig the minutest particular (of the Mosaic law)

3. The mode of utterance peculiar to an individual, locality, or nation, as 'he has a slight accent, a strong provincial accent, an indisputably Irish, Scotch, American, French or German accent.'

This utterance consists mainly in a prevailing quality of tone, or in a peculiar alteration of pitch, but may include mispronunciation of vowels or consonants, misplacing of stress, and misinflection of a sentence The locality of a speaker is generally clearly marked by this kind of accent. 6 Prosody The stress laid at more or less fixed intervals on certain syllables of a verse, the succession of which constitutes the rhythm or measure of the verse

English verse is theoretically marked by a periodical recurrence of strong syllables, having a loud stress, a certain number of times in a line, separated by one or two weak or unaccented syllables The habits of poets do not however carry out this theoretical law Thus in 'to err is human, to forgive divine,' theory would require to to be strong, similarly in 'for the poor craven bridegroom said never a word,' theory would require the first syllable in craven to be weak and both groom and said to be as weak as the -ver and a which follow. They are not so Hence has arisen the conception of rhythmically or metrically accented and unaccented syllables, as distinguished from the grammatically or verbally accented syllables Thus, in the above examples, to has the rhythmical and not the verbal or phrase accent, and craven has the syllabic but not the rhythmical accent, err has both verbal and rhythmical accent, divine has both syllabic and rhythmical accent (A J E)

¶ The preposition used after the passive accompanied is still somewhat unsettled. As in passives generally, it was formerly with; but by is now always said of personal agents, and, it appears, of things personified or viewed as active agents: 'He was accompanied by two policemen,' 'a ship accompanied by several native junks' When accompany is used causally, with introduces the secondary agent or instrument, as 'he accompanied the word with a blow,' and this is of course retained in the passive, 'the word was accompanied with a blow (by him)' Hence with is used in the passive whenever the agency may be looked upon as merely secondary, or as an accompaniment rather than a companion, even though no primary agent is expressed, 'The operation was accompanied with much pain' Cf associated, combined with; attended with pain, by satellites, followed by unpleasant symptoms.

Acetylene (æ sĭtilīn) Chem [f Acetyl + Gr -ηνη female descendant, weaker derivative see -ene] A gaseous hydrocarbon C_2H_2, = HC ≡ CH, also called Ethine, interesting as being producible by the direct combination of carbon and hydrogen at a high temperature, and of forming by further syntheses more complex carbon compounds, thus rendering possible the artificial preparation of organic substances from their simple elements

1864 H Sinclr Biology I 8 With the exception of acetylene, the various hydro-carbons are not producible by directly combining their elements 1869 Roscoe Elem Chem. 95 Acetylene is a colourless gas, which burns with a bright luminous flame, and possesses a disagreeable and very peculiar odour, it is produced in all cases of incomplete combustion, and its smell may be noticed when a candle burns with a smoky flame 1873 Watts Fownes' Chem I 559 Ethine or Acetylene is one of the constituents of coal gas 1877 Ibid II 1 Recently it has been shown that ethine or acetylene, C_2H_2, can be produced by the direct combination of carbon and hydrogen, that this compound can be made to take up two additional atoms of hydrogen to form [olefiant gas, or] ethene C_2H_4, and that this can be converted into alcohol, C_2H_6O, a body formerly supposed to be producible only by the fermentation of sugar

suffers the action, and Neuter Verbs which assert an action or state that has neither character 2 Applied to all verbs that assert action as distinct from mere existence or state, in this sense Active Verbs are divided into Active Transitive, in which the action passes over to or affects an object, as kill (corresponding to the Active of 1), and Active Intransitive, in which the action does not affect an object, as rise (forming part of the Neuter verbs of 1), Neuter in this nomenclature being restricted to verbs of existence or state, as be, sit

Both of these uses of the word are etymologically defensible, but both are inconvenient the distinction between action and state is not always clear, and above all is one of things, not of assertions about them, that of action and passion is merely that of two ways of viewing and asserting the same action, while the passing over of an action to an object or the contrary is better expressed by Transitive and Intransitive, and is moreover not a division of verbs, but of the constructions of each verb separately, the great majority of verbs in Eng having both constructions

2 While the refashioning of words in OFr. a- was going on in 16th c, mechanical imitation or pedantic assumption extended ad- and its variants to many words in which a- had quite a different origin, as L ab, OFr en (an), es, re, OE a (ar), on, æt, etc, as in a(d)vance Fr avancer L ab-anteāre, a(d)debted OFr endetté, a(c)cloy OFr encloyer L inclāvāre, admerveyl OFr esmerveiller, a(f)fray OFr. esfreyer, a(f)force OFr esforcer L exfortiare, a(c)curse* ME a-curse, a(l)lay OE a-lecgan, a(c)know(ledge OE on-cnawan, a(d)blast OE onblæstan, a(d)dight OE a-dihtan, ge-dihtan, a(d)mıral Arab amīr-al-. Adamant (æ dămănt) Also 4–5 adamaunt, -aund, ademaunt, -and; atha-, attha-, atthe-, attemant, -maunt, 5 admont, 6 adamounde [a literary OFr adamaunt, ademaunt, ad L adamant-em (nom adamas), a Gr ἀδάμας, ἀδάμαντ-α, orig adj = invincible (f ἀ not + δαμά-ω I tame), afterwards a name of the hardest metal, prob steel, also applied by Theophrastus to the hardest crystalline gem then known, the emery-stone of Naxos, 'an amorphous form of corundum' In L poetically for the hardest iron or steel, or anything very hard and indestructible, also, with Plin, the name of a transparent crystalline gem of the hexahedral system, apparently corundum or white sapphire, but extended and at length transferred to the still harder DIAMOND (q v) after this became known in the West The early med L writers apparently explaining the word from adamā-re 'to take a liking to, have an attraction for,' took the lapidem adamantem for the loadstone or magnet (an ore of iron, and thus also associated with the ancient metallic sense), and with this confusion the word passed into the modern languages In OE. it occurs as ādamans, from med L, and in 13th c as adamantines stan, a transl. of lapis adamantinus, with the adj mistaken for a sb in apposition to lapis, and so englished as stone of adamantin In the current form it is a 14th c adoption of the literary Fr adamaunt, ademaunt, adapted from the L in place of the popular form aimant (—late L adimantem*, cf Pr adiman, asiman, ayman, Sp iman) loadstone, also found in Eng, see AYMONT Diamant arose as a variant of adamant or adimant, see DIAMOND]

Name of an alleged rock or mineral, as to which vague, contradictory, and fabulous notions long prevailed. The properties ascribed to it show a confusion of ideas between the diamond (or other hard gems) and the loadstone or magnet, though by writers affecting better information, it was distinguished from one or other, or from both The confusion with the loadstone ceased with the 17th c, and the word was then often used by scientific writers as a synonym of DIAMOND. In modern use it is only a poetical or rhetorical name for the embodiment of surpassing hardness; that which is impregnable to any application of force.
